But if this philosophic pretension is to be made good, and the boundless claims of Hegelian Gnosticism are to be justified, it is evidently indispensable that the absolute idealist should find some way of getting rid of all metaphysical causes which may influence or interfere with the alleged necessary order of sequence among phenomena. If, for instance, there exist, as Dr. Martineau and a host of other thinkers believe there do exist, rational personalities, or causal selves, which in the moral crises of their history have an open alternative before them, it is of necessity impossible for the human intellect to fully explain the relations between successive phenomena without considering the character and the mode of action of those metaphysical causes to whose causality the order of the phenomenal world is due. If man possesses real freedom of choice in the formation of his character it is evident that the antecedent mental states which exist in a season of temptation may be followed by either of two equally possible moral decisions. Supposing this to be the case, it necessarily follows that no mere study of phenomena apart from the clear insight into the nature of the noümenal causes which manifest themselves in the visible world can possibly give an exhaustive explanation of the relations of sequence among phenomena. If we are not mistaken it is here that a fatal rift reveals itself in the elaborate and imposing structure of Hegelian Gnosticism ; and the signs of the present time appear to us to indicate very clearly that this too pretentious edifice of intellectual speculation is already tottering, and will ere long, like similar previous systems which have not been built on the solid rock of man's ethical and spiritual experience, entirely collapse. Absolute idealism has doubtless contributed elements of high and permanent value to the world's thought, but long before the close of the present century it will, we feel assured, as a system of philosophy, cease to awaken more than a merely historical interest ; and its downfall will be a salutary reminder to all future system-builders that there are necessary limits to the explanatory power of the human intellect, and that all attempts to overpass or to efface these limits by denying the validity of the universal moral judgments of mankind will in the long run inevitably prove futile and self-destructive.

It is to no purpose that Hegelian writers reiterate the statement that if the human soul in the crucial moments of temptation really had an open alternative before it, and could freely choose between obeying and resisting the voice of the indwelling and self-revealing God, it would be a "miracle !" Thinkers like Lotze, Martineau, and Lord Kelvin not only believe in the daily performance of countless such so-called miracles, but they believe also that it is chiefly for the advent of such "miracle"-workers on this planet that the whole course of biological evolution has been gradually preparing the way ; and for ourselves we make bold to think it by no means improbable that to the eternal Trinity of Thought, Will, and Love on whose creative energy the cosmos is ever depending, the calling into existence of free spirits capable alike of real sin and also of true heroism, is a vastly more precious and desirable end than even the unlimited extension of the range of scientific explanation and of Hegelian Gnosticism.

*Green's "Prolegomena to Ethics," p. 113.

Dr. Martineau's perception of that ethical weakness in Hegelianism which disqualifies it for permanent acceptance as a satisfactory system of philosophy, accorded exactly with the judgment of Emeritus Professor Fraser, who in his masterly estimate of Berkeleian as compared with Hegelian Idealism says :—"The Hegelian "seems to claim, as attainable philosophy, "an intuition of the rational articulation "of the universe of things and persons "in the unity of the creative thought. "This, if really attained, would eliminate "mystery from our physical and moral "experience, and convert philosophy "into absolute science. If it has fulfilled "its promise, it has translated all faith "into rationalised thought. But I cannot "find that this all-comprehensive system "really tallies with the experience which "it is bound to formulate adequately, and "also to explain; or that it has yet got "so far as to solve even so clamant a "difficulty as the existence within the uni-"verse of immoral agents and moral evil. "We ask for intellectual relief for moral "difficulties, and we are offered the "'organisation of thought.' We look for "bread and we find a stone."

It was a matter of great surprise to Dr. Martineau that this system of exclusive intellectualism, which wins plausibility at the expense of ignoring or explaining away that which gives to the individual soul its chief dignity and value, and which empties the universe of dynamic energy and of all real causation, should have maintained itself so long, and found favour with so many thoughtful minds. He noticed, however, that its influence was most dominant in academic lecture-rooms, and was not considerable either in the sphere of religious thought or in that of general literature. But though the revolt against it was longer in coming than he had expected, it was not very far off; for according to Professor Henry Jones, in his brilliant and interesting paper in the Hibbert Journal for January, 1903, such a revolt is now present and is very widespread, even among the specially philosophic class. "The view," he says, "of the limitations of the intelligence, "and of the subordinate worth of its "products, is now maintained in some "form or other by all kinds of philoso-"phical sects. Ethical idealists, personal "idealists, pluralists, however little they "may agree with each other or with the "older school of Positivists and Agnostics, "are all united in a revolt against what "they deem the extravagant claims of the "mere intellect." Professor Jones himself appears to think that though the philosophical system advocated by "the older school of English idealists" is at present so widely distrusted, it is nevertheless destined in the future to more than recover its former influence, and to receive at length world-wide and ever-enduring recognition as furnishing the only key which is competent to satisfactorily solve the riddle of the universe. "It cannot be "denied," he remarks, "that the present "age cares little for theology, and hopes "even less from metaphysics; but it may "be maintained, on the other hand, that "this age is pre-eminently willing to listen "to its poets, and that it is pre-eminently "characteristic of these poets to dwell upon "the profoundest convictions regarding "the spiritual life of man." These words are profoundly true; but we have hitherto had a strong impression that the poets referred to—Wordsworth, Tennyson, and Browning—all implicitly held a philosophy of the cosmos identical with that expounded by Lotze and Martineau—a philosophy which recognises the ontological reality of those "miraculous" acts of free moral choice for which the Absolute Idealists can find no place in their conception of the universe of reality. It seems almost inevitable, however, that earnest thinkers should read their own special philosophical views into the utterances of their favourite poets. Thus Professor Pringle-Pattison quotes, in confirmation of his own Weltanschauung, the words of Tennyson, "Our wills are ours to make them Thine"; but when we read in the Hibbert Journal his criticism of Martineau's theory of volition it turns out that in the Edinburgh Professor's view there is no "open alternative" before the human will, and that the power we possess of making our wills into God's will only means after all that our wills are so related to the Divine will that in the course of time, if we live long enough, our wills by a process of necessary psychological evolution will become approximately identical with the immanent Eternal Will revealed in our ideals. Lord Tennyson would, we venture to think, have been amazed to learn that this interpretation could be given to his well-known lines. As Mr. Geo. Galloway puts it, in his very acute and, in our judgment, conclusive defence, in the Hibbert Journal, of Dr. Martineau against Professor Pattison's criticism:—"Though, in Professor Patti-"son's view, character be no mechanical "product, but developed by the spiritual "principle in man, it none the less ex-"cludes contingency from the personal "history. The present is the necessary "outcome of the past. On this view "remorse and repentance rest on an illu-"sion." Probably Professor Pringle-Pattison would reply, more hegeliano, that the man is justly accountable for his choices, because, though they could not have been made otherwise, they are his own choices, and are not forced upon him by external constraint, so that, in the phraseology of Hegelian handbooks, "moral freedom simply means spontaneous self-determination." We agree, however, with Coleridge and with Martineau that not all the philosophical ingenuity in the world will ever succeed in persuading the unsophisticated mind that it is truly responsible and blameworthy for sins that it could not possibly have left uncommitted.

In concluding these papers we may remind our readers that the idealism with which we have been contrasting Dr. Martineau's philosophical judgments is what is called absolute idealism. It is necessary to mention that during the last few years there has risen into prominence both at Cambridge and at Oxford a very different form of idealism, which is closely akin to Bishop Berkeley's. Of this resuscitated Berkeleianism Professor James Ward and Dr. H. Rashdall are conspicuous representatives. With this theory Dr. Martineau would have had no serious disagreement. On most essential points it reproduces the ideas to which he attached chief importance. It accepts, for instance, his metaphysical view of causation, explains the idea of cause as derived entirely from our experience of personal volition, and asserts almost in Dr. Martineau's own words that "every event must have a "cause, but the cause need not be one that "works uniformly; and that therefore a "violation of the uniformity of nature "is not to be regarded as à priori incon-"ceivable."*

This recent emergence of Dr. Martineau's characteristic conceptions out of the very heart of the highest culture in our two greatest universities goes far, we think, to justify R. H. Hutton's prophecy that it will be in the direction of Lotze's and Martineau's thinking, and not in that of Hegel's, that the religious world will finally look for the most adequate expression of the philosophy which is implicit in Christianity.

NORWICH MEMORIES:

Early Nonconformist History.

II.

The Norwich Presbyterians in 1672 must have been a fairly numerous and somewhat influential body. The names of some were known in connection with civic offices: a John Dersley was a Sheriff in 1673, and at the time these licences to preachers and houses were being granted, the Mayor and Corporation of the city received an application from some of the Presbyterians for the lease of part of "the Long Granary at the New Hall," the said granary forming part of the cloisters of the monastery of the Black Friars. The Corporation acceded to their request, and granted a lease dated May 14, 1672, for five years, "of that part of the East Granary nearest to St. Andrew's parish," which would be the part now occupied by the Edward VI. Middle School main building. The grant was made to John Barnham, hosier; Francis Annyson, gentleman; and John Dersley, haberdasher. The rent was £12 10s. per annum, with the "further payment of a peppercorn on the first day of August in each year, if the same be lawfully demanded." Mr. Snowden appears to have made application at the same time for a licence to preach in "a house late belonging to the Black Friars, in St. Andrew's, Norwich, which was not approved." What house this was is uncertain; perhaps Mr. Snowden did not hold a general licence.

The Independents made an application at the same time as the Presbyterians for leave to worship in the old monastery buildings, and were granted the use of part of the same granary, now no longer used as a corn store. While worshipping apart, it is interesting to note that the Independents and Presbyterians found common ground in acts of charity, for it is recorded that on November 27, 1672, the officers of the Presbyterian congregation at the Granary brought in £3 11s. 8¼d. for the relief of the child of a man named Cotton, and that the Independents at the same time brought in £1 5s. 4d. for the same purpose.

Early in the year 1687 the Presbyterian congregation meeting in the Granary felt strongly the desirability of having a meeting-house of their own in which to worship God after the manner that seemed best to them. Doubtless the venture was felt to be a serious one, considering the unsettled state of affairs, and probably the older members of the church shook their heads, and feared that the scheme would end in disaster. If such fears existed, they were overcome, and not only was it determined that a meeting-house should be built, and from articles of agreement made May 11 of the above year, we learn that the site selected was "all that parcell of ground of him the said Samuel Fromantell, which was measured and set out by Geo. Wiggett, carpenter, containing by estimation two and forty foot in breadth and eighty-three foot in length, more or less, abutting upon the garden, &c. : : . and all the passage and entry adjoining the shop of S. Fromantell opening into the common street against the 'Black Boys,' and all that piece of ground being six foot in breadth all the way from said entry to said first-mentioned piece of ground." This piece of ground was "a portion of the great garden some time belonging to the prior and convent of the late Friars Preachers," on the northern side of the river Wensum and the further side of Colegate-street, where the Dominicans settled when they came to Norwich in the year 1226. Next we find that on May 24 of the year '87 an agreement was made between Thomas Nuttall and John Mottram, worsted weavers, with Thomas Sad and Stephen Cooper, bricklayers. This agreement is still in existence, and from it we learn that the proposed building designated a messuage or house (probably it would have been used as a dwelling-house had their meetings been from any cause prohibited) was to be sixty-four feet long, forty feet wide, and nineteen feet in height, more or less, as agreed. The materials were to be good, strong, and sound; spaces were to be left for doors and windows, and four brick piers were to be made in the said walls on each side of the house. After the roof had been put on, the walls, ceiling, and roof were to be properly finished, and left white, and a specified portion of the floor was to be paved with good hard white brick. Payment was to be made at the rate of three shillings for every yard solid measure, or two shillings and fourpence for every yard running measure, "as the said Ths. Nuttall and Jno. Mottram shall elect." Threepence was to be paid for every yard of walls rendered, plastered, and whitened; ninepence per yard for lathing, roofing, plastering, and whitening the ceiling and roof, and fifteen pence per yard for the paving. The bricklayers' work had to be finished within five weeks from the time of starting, under penalty. There is no record of what the carpenter's work was to cost, or specification of what was to be provided by him, or the plumber and glazier; but it was agreed that it would be lawful for the said Ths. Nuttall and Jno. Mottram to take up, pull down, and carry away all pews, seats, galleries, and pulpit which shall be made in the now to be erected fabric. We also learn that two hundred pounds or more was to be expended on the building.

There is no drawing of the building in existence, but there is in the Norwich Castle Museum a map published by Cleer in 1696, and which belonged to a local antiquary, John Kirkpatrick. Upon this map, in its proper site, Kirkpatrick has sketched the Presbyterian meeting-house. This sketch was made prior to 1728. He also published a panoramic view of the city of Norwich, which gives a similar view, very small, of course, of the meeting-house In these sketches the meeting-house has the appearance of two dwelling-houses built side by side, with the somewhat sharply pitched roofs forming a valley gutter between them. Two doors are shown, with windows on either side, and a dormer window in each roof. A chimney is shown, and in one sketch some windows are indicated on the level of the gallery. The building was enlarged somewhat in 1693, but even then its seating capacity is much overestimated when placed at 1,000 persons, as is done in his "History of the Octagon Chapel," by Mr. John Taylor. Before enlargement it was a smaller building than the present chapel, which will accommodate between five and six hundred persons, and the first meeting-house never occupied a larger area than the present building. Like other buildings of its kind, it was hidden behind dwelling-houses, and approached by a narrow alley or passage, between the house of Mr. Fromantell, a turner, and Mr. Robert Crome, a baker.

The names of those who ministered to the spiritual needs of the congregation from the days when the new meeting-house was opened until the time when the fine present Octagon Chapel was built during the ministry of the Rev. Dr. John Taylor, are the Revs. Dr. John Collings; Benjamin Snowden, M.A.; Josiah Chorley, M.A.; Peter Finch, M.A.; John Brooke, Edward Crane, and Samuel Bourn. Of the members of the original congregation only one name continues to be represented, but that, happily, is of one of the founders of this first meeting-house, John Mottram, whose descendants have continued to be pillars of strength to the cause of liberal religion. The names of a few who were members of the congregation of the first meeting-house have come down to us on memorial tablets on the walls of the present chapel, one to Mr. Benj. Elden, who died in 1759, whose widow left a considerable benefaction to the congregation; another to a Mrs. Sarah Petty, who died in 1751, "In hope that her Christian virtues and amiable deportment, particularly her catholic, candid, benevolent, and peaceable spirit, which for many years contributed to the happiness of this congregation and of all near her in life, will be honoured in the day of our Lord, and add to the felicity of the blessed society above."

This meeting-house was standing for nearly seventy years. Of the Octagon Chapel, which succeeded it, we shall tell in a further article.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Gateshead.—On Sunday morning a memorial service was conducted by Rev. G. A. Ferguson, who made special reference to the splendid work accomplished in Gateshead by the late Rev. Arthur Harvie, the founder and first minister of this Church. There was a large congregation, and the service was most impressive; the grief and loss was felt by everyone present. A resolution of sympathy with Mrs. Harvie and family was carried in silence, after which the "Dead March" in Saul was rendered.

London, Stratford.—The first of the series of Services for the People was held in the Town Hall, Stratford, on Sunday evening, April 2, when the service was conducted, and the address delivered, by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. There were 570 people present, including an excellent choir from Forest Gate, Limehouse, Stepney, and Stratford. The singing was very hearty, led by the splendid Town Hall organ, and the people were reverent and attentive. There was considerable eagerness to obtain copies of the Unitarian tracts displayed on the table. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Mr. W. J. Noel, and an excellent band of workers, deserve great credit for the admirable way in which the arrangements were carried out. The offertory amounted to £2 13s. 4d. On April 9, the Rev. J. C. Street will conduct the service.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—At the meeting of the committee of this association, held on Monday evening at Newcastle, reference was made to the death of Rev. A. Harvie, formerly missionary of the association. A resolution expressing deep respect for his memory and appreciation of his work, and also sincerest sympathy with his widow and children, was moved by the President (Rev. W. H. Lambelle). It was seconded by Mr. J. Duncan Donald, who spoke most feelingly of Mr. Harvie's many excellences, and described the touching scene at the funeral service at Northampton. Rev. F. Wood supported, and the motion was carried in respectful silence.

Richmond (Appointment).—The Rev Felix Taylor, B.A., formerly of Tenterden, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit rendered vacant by the retirement of the Rev. S. Farrington. Mr. Taylor will begin his new duties on Sunday, April 16.

Walmsley.—A three days' bazaar was held last week for the purpose of securing funds for renovation and school extension. Mr. C. W. Jones, of Liverpool, son of a former minister at Walmsley, was prevented by illness from performing the opening ceremony. Mr. T. Holt, ex-Mayor of Bury, opened on the second day, and Mr. W. Healey, of Heywood, on the third Nearly £300 was realised.

(Many reports are unavoidably deferred this week.)

At a meeting of the Senate on March 29 Professor G. Dawes Hicks was elected to the office of examiner in philosophy in the University of London. Professor Hicks holds a similar position in the University of Glasgow.

The Soul:

Its Sorrows and Aspirations.

BY

FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN

WITH MEMOIR AND INTRODUCTION BY

CHARLES B. UPTON, B.A., B.Sc.

CONTENTS.

MEMOIR AND INTRODUCTION.
PREFACE TO FIRST AND THIRD EDITIONS.
I. SENSE OF THE INFINITE WITHOUT US.
II. SENSE OF SIN.
III. SENSE OF PERSONAL RELATION TO GOD.
IV. SPIRITUAL PROGRESS.
V. HOPES CONCERNING FUTURE LIFE.
VI. PROSPECT OF CHRISTIANITY.

"The Soul: its Sorrows and Aspirations" was F. W. Newman's most important contribution to religious literature. Mr. Upton says:—"Both Francis and his brother, Cardinal Newman, were intensely religious men, but while the latter allowed his own direct spiritual insight to be over-ruled and modified by the authority of the Church, the former would recognise no dogmas as divine until he found them endorsed by the living voice of the Eternal in his own soul."

This is the Centenary year of the birth of F. W. Newman—he was born June 27th, 1805. There are many readers in all parts of the world who will rejoice to possess this well-printed edition, containing also Mr. Upton's brief Memoir, and valuable Introduction.

II. SOME PEOPLE WHO ALWAYS COME LATE.
III. PRAISING GOD BY PROXY.
IV. PEWS.
V. A COUNTRY TEA PARTY.
VI. A RATHER FASTIDIOUS CONGREGATION.
VII. SOME CANDIDATES FOR A CONGREGATION.
VIII. OVERMUCH DISCOURSE.
IX. A SHOCKING CASE OF ABDUCTION.
X. UNSOCIAL WORSHIP.
XI. PARSONIC ACID.

These delightful and humorous sketches issued in a dainty volume, were written and published anonymously by the late Dr. Brooke Herford, in the years 1860—61. They will well repay perusal. "There is," says Mr. Wicksteed in his Biographical Sketch, "a strange persistence in the minor weaknesses of humanity."

"Essays . . . all touched with Dr. Herford's habitual good sense, keen observation, and genial humour."—Manchester Guardian.

"He wrote from intimate experience of congregations, the most respectable, and of the humblest in Lancashire and Cheshire, and there are some good stories from those days so long ago. . . . One more memorial of a life, rich in genial wisdom and wholesome laughter, and its power of strong, helpful ministry."—Inquirer.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. P. H. Wicksteed will lecture at University College, London, next session on "The Significance of Jevons's Work as an Economist." The series, which forms the Jevons Memorial Lectures, 1905, will begin May 8, and will be open to the public without payment or ticket.

IN our "News" column we report a resolution passed on Sunday at the Great Meeting, Leicester, in connection with the much regretted illness of the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who has been advised to seek restoration by a prolonged sojourn in a milder climate. Mr. Lummis, who is to stay for a while at Lynton, may be assured that the deep sympathy of a host of friends goes with him. He is one of our most gifted and scholarly men, and we can ill spare him, even for an interval, from active work among us.

WE have the pleasure of informing the brethren who from time to time receive grants from the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund that on Wednesday a test case was argued before Mr. Justice Phillimore (by Mr. Danckwertz, K.C., and Mr. Austen Cartmell), on the question of the liability of such grants to income tax; and that the judgment was in favour of the appeal. In consequence all grants made by the Managers of this Fund are declared free of duty.

THE wide-spreading influence of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's teaching is indicated by the fact that his book, "God and the Soul," many copies of which have been circulated in India, is about to be translated into Telugu, one of the principal languages of Southern India. On Feb. 25, in connection with the students' weekly service, a memorial meeting was held in the Prayer Hall of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, Calcutta. Dr. P. K. Ray presided, and several gentlemen, including Mr. B. Sen and Mr. H. Chandra Sarkar, spoke in grateful terms of Mr. Armstrong's life and work.

IN addition to the notes of the Good Friday and Easter celebration of Dr. Martineau's centenary which we made last week, it should be observed that the series of meetings will be appropriately begun by a Lantern Lecture entitled, "The Martineaus in Norwich," to be given at the Octagon Institute, St. George's Plain, Norwich, on Thursday evening, at eight, by the Rev. Alfred Hall. Much highly interesting and illustrative material has been collected by Mr. Hall for this unique occasion, and visitors are cordially invited to attend.

THE latest Oriental pamphlet isssued at Essex Hall in pursuance of the foreign work of the Unitarian Association, is a Message to Mohammedans by the Rev. J. Harwood, which has been translated into Urdu, the prevalent literary medium for the north-west provinces, where the followers of Islam in India are chiefly to be found. Mr. Harwood, whose travels as our missionary entitle his opinion to respect, believes that to many Mahommedans the news will be welcome that a form of Christian thought and teaching exists which combines loyalty to Christ with a full recognition of the messages of other great world-teachers; and that the ties of sympathy and mutual goodwill will be strengthened by such an appeal as he has prepared.

THE Budget, introduced by Mr. Austen Chamberlain, meets with general approval, though the warnings of former Chancellors, such as Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, ought to have brought forth more fruit by way of economical reforms. The enormous expenditure on non-productive things cannot commend itself to any wise mind; and we can only judge that the fear of "Society" and vested interests in the Army and Navy hold back our financial experts from proposing substantial reductions. The feature of the Budget which has attracted most attention, however, is its freedom from those protectionist devices which the elder Mr. Chamberlain has so strongly recommended. The same week that sees his notions coldly treated, even in his son's Budget, has seen a strong demonstration of Unionist Free Traders under the lead of the Duke of Devonshire. On the whole, we seem to be less in danger of the Protection policy now than at any time since Mr. Joseph Chamberlain publicly avowed it as his own.

WE are told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that a "wave of sobriety" is passing over the land. The grosser pleasures of drink and the public-house are yielding, it is said, slowly, yet with distinct constancy, to attractions of another kind. The new pleasures of the people may not rise as yet very high; according to the same authority they are largely connected with the cheap music-hall, outdoor sports, and excursions. As to the first, the quality of music and sentiment is often so very cheap that we can only find room for congratulation in the common testimony that there is less of the nasty about this class of entertainment than formerly. As to the outdoor sports, among which the pleasures of watching Mr. Kipling's "muddied oafs" and "flannelled fools" at football and cricket, are becoming yearly more prominent, one may express satisfaction that with all their drawbacks they are free from the worse evils of the race-course. But the tendency to travel, if only at first as a cheap tripper, is one that promises better for the mental and bodily health of the people.

IN order that the full benefit may be derived from this increasing disposition to travel, it is imperatively necessary that people should learn to use their eyes. The rudimentary pleasure taken by young people in the beauties of nature wants cultivation. Few sights are prettier than the delight of children in making posies by the wayside. Few sights are more pitiful than the wasted relics of their hastily-gathered treasures. The big youths snatch eagerly at the blackthorn blossom, and often come home laden with willow "palms"; but of real discriminating enjoyment of the fields there is all too little. We wish that in every church and school there were a rambling club to diffuse that little more knowledge which would render holidaying a true delight and mental refreshment.

We have all been deeply saddened by the terrible earthquake which has taken place in India. Full details are still wanting, but enough is known to render certain a very high estimate of the loss of life and property. Naturally, our feelings have been more deeply stirred by the fate that has overcome so many English residents; but reflecting people will remember that the natives are, after all, just as human as our own kith and kin, and that their sorrows are just as real. There will be, of course, some serious attempt made to relieve the distress, though much of the damage done is irreparable.

We wonder how many of our readers, who were thrilled with horror and sympathy of the news of the earthquake have realised that a chronic disaster afflicts our Indian fellow subjects, an evil by the side of which even an earthquake that destroys ten or twenty thousand lives sinks into minor significance. We refer to the plague which sweeps off, as it has been long doing, more people in any one week than this extraordinary convulsion of nature did which strikes our imagination so vividly. It is, we believe, a fact that upwards of a quarter of a million deaths have occurred from plague this year alone. If anything like this mortality occurred in England what an outcry there would be! But the valleys of India are farther away—and, after all, what is an Indian?

Our readers will probably recall an appeal made some time ago in our columns on behalf the Brahmo Girls' School, Calcutta. We are happy to record that the new building then contemplated has been erected, and on March 22 it was formally opened by the Lieut.-Governor of Bengal, Sir Andrew Fraser, in the presence of a large and distinguished company. The report presented stated that this is the fourteenth year of the institution. Rather more than one hundred girls are on the roll of the school, about one-fourth being Hindoos and three-fourths Brahmins. The total outlay on the building, site, &c., has been 87,000 rupees. Towards this sum the Government has granted 25,000 rupees; 20,977 rupees have been paid from the Mary Carpenter Fund, and other donations amount to 20,875 rupees. In the latter is included the sum of £205 (=3,078 rupees) from English subscribers, raised by Mr. Ion Pritchard's appeal referred to above.

Exceptional interest attaches to the forthcoming meetings of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, when Professor Forsyth will deliver the presidential address. This is the first session since the adoption of the new constitution. Students of ecclesiastical politics in our churches and elsewhere will watch with interest the development of the more closely knit organisation and its result on the efficient working of religious institutions. One outcome, which is far from improbable, is the reduction of the importance of the Union's public assembly. This may be expected to follow the line taken by, e.g., the Trade Union Congress. The popular interest of the Congress is enhanced; the practical results are yearly less. The Congregational meetings are sure to retain their charm of enthusiasm, even if the work comes to be done more and more in committee. The significance of the forthcoming gathering is found in the fact that, although new rules have been adopted, they do not come into force until the autumn. This session will, therefore, be the last of a long series of assemblies which have played a large part in the history of modern Congregationalism.

Perhaps the existence in every county of a Congregational Union has a good deal to do with the popular effective of this group of churches. Once, or more often twice, in the year the representatives of the various societies in town or village meet together. Often, the gatherings are large enough to afford the buoyant sense of a multitude, and ministers and people go home feeling themselves to be in the swim of things. These meetings are being held at the present time, and occasion was taken of the Yorkshire meetings at Sheffield for a very striking address by the chairman, the Rev. H. H. Oakley. The speech is reported, though too briefly for our curiosity, in last week's Christian World. The subject was the effectiveness of the pulpit, a sufficiently threadbare theme. Mr. Oakley dealt with several topics which always come to the front on these occasions and proceeded to treat of a suspicion which is said to be prevalent that Protestant preachers have borrowed the Roman doctrine and practice of "reserve." If they do not actually hold back something of their belief, at least they are thought to evade thorny questions, and often to do worse than this, to feed themselves on spiced and savoury cakes from Messrs. Williams & Norgate, and their congregations on simple barley loaves from Messrs. Passmore & Alabaster. If such a habit be anywhere prevalent, it is, as Mr. Oakley affirms, disastrous. There may be a simple explanation of the feeling in the general habit ministers have of thinking it necessary to be positive and to give a clear lead, even if they are not quite clear themselves, or at least to avoid the subjects on which they cannot be certain, whereas very often a congregation would gain the greatest help from knowing that their minister, like themselves, was in suspense.

We are glad to find prominent ministers in the Congregational body expressing themselves as firmly as the Rev. Eric Lawrence does in the Examiner on the London "Religious Revival." "I find "still deeper reason to deplore the teaching that is given by some prominent "leaders in the present evangelistic move"ments. When Dr. Torrey declares, e.g., "as he did to a great gathering of City "men in the Cannon-street Hotel, that if "'Christ were accepted the whole of the "'Old Testament was bound to be accepted "'also . . . as the divinely inspired Word "'of God,' I am filled with amazement "and regret. If Dr. Torrey believes this, "he may, of course, feel bound to say it, "but I think he ought to know it is not "true." Again: "Many a man has made "shipwreck of his faith, or been doomed "to spend long years in the sunless gulfs "of doubt, because he has been taught so "much that he was obliged in the light of "later knowledge to unlearn. . . . There "is yet another thing that constitutes a "grave peril in these revival movements, "and demands our serious and attentive "thought. They would appear sometimes "to lead many persons to undervalue the "quiet, regular, unsensational methods of "appeal and work, on the maintenance of "which the progress of the kingdom of "God mainly depends."

It is a good thing to have our own opinion on these matters reinforced from the orthodox side. And our faith is confirmed that there is a strong movement among evangelical Christians in the direction in which we ourselves wish to move. They dread even more keenly than we do this recrudescence of superstition, because they are nearer to it, and see at closer quarters its deplorable effects.

The note on the Rev. Tom Sykes, of Hull, last week should have described him as a Primitive Methodist, not as a Congregationalist. It is perhaps more noteworthy (as a correspondent suggests) that the liberal utterances we quoted come from such a theological quarter; but we are well aware of a good many "advanced" Primitives.

The Late Mr. J. Cogan Conway.—At a meeting of managers of the Ministers' Pension Fund, held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter presiding, it was resolved: "That this meeting of the managers of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, assembled for the first time since the lamented death of their colleague, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, founder and secretary of the fund, records its deep sense of the loss occasioned by his decease. He first brought before the National Conference at Sheffield, 1897, the need of some additional provision for ministers in their old age, and he pleaded their cause with untiring patience. He took an active part in the preparation of a suitable scheme, and (after its acceptance by the Conference at Leicester, 1900) in the collection of the fund. Ever since its establishment he gave time and thought without stint to its administration; and its success is in great measure due to his wide knowledge of the members of our ministry, his appreciation of their work, his never-failing kindness, and his punctuality in all business arrangements. To Mrs. Conway the managers respectfully offer the assurance of their sympathy in her great bereavement."

Whoever is faithful to a first grace that opens on him shall have a second in advance of it, and if he still follows the messenger of God, angels ever brighter shall go before his way.—James Martineau.

THE BRIGHT GALILEAN VISION.

The traveller from Nazareth to Tiberias approaches, towards the end of the day, a line of cliffs, beyond which the road winds downwards to the shores of the lake. A rocky hill (Karn Hattin) rises to the north, some 1,100 feet in height, crowned, or, as it were, guarded by two peaks; and on the slope between and below these, tradition says, the "Sermon on the Mount" was preached to the multitude who followed the Master thither. The tradition is doubtless false, dating only from Crusading times; but it brings out that strange irony of events which is often so full of significance. For near that spot, where the gospel of human love and peace was said to have been proclaimed, the Crusaders met the forces of Saladin, and were defeated and slaughtered in one of the most horrible battles of that unhappy and unholy war. The professed followers of him who was said to have pronounced there his blessing on the peacemakers were deservedly beaten by the Mohammedan soldiery, and their power in the land finally and effectually broken.

Thinking of this, and perhaps of other such startling contrasts in the history of Christendom, the traveller reaches the crest of the hill above Tiberias and looks down on the calm blue waters of the "Sea of Galilee." It was along the north-western shores of that inland water that the greater part of the ministry of Jesus was probably accomplished. And when, on a bright morning in spring, we rode along the edge of the Plain of Gennesaret, where the cities of Magdala and Capernaum once flourished, and saw the low hills which border that plain to north and south, my companion suggested that the slope of one of those hills was the much more probable scene of the great gospel appeal. Karn Hattin is too distant, and does not look easy of access from the lake shore. But for the Teacher to leave the heat and depression of the low-lying plain, and climb one of these near hills, and sit there in the cooler air, with the multitude gathered around him, would seem natural enough. Probably the whole discourse, as we now read it, was never spoken in one place, at one time. But the "Beatitudes," and the great passage in which men are bidden to "take no anxious thought," but "seek first the kingdom of God," may well have been spoken on some green, flowery hillside above that beautiful valley and the broad waters of the lake.

It may well have been on some spring morning, in the fresh bright springtime of his ministry, that he sat there, amid the wealth of colour and abundance of growing things, and said, "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow"; "Behold the fowls of the air"; "Be not anxious for the morrow"; "Lay up for yourselves treasure in heavenly things"; "Seek first the kindgom of God and His righteousness, and all that is needful of other things shall be added unto you."

I quoted in a former article the saying that the climate and scenery of the Plain of Gennesaret was "the nearest approach to perpetual spring" that earth could show. And the thought and hope of Jesus just then, as he opened his mouth and proclaimed his fresh glad tidings, must have been full of the life of spring, in its passion of love and joy for man.

It was said that, after his baptism and the descent of the dove-like spirit upon him and his lonely struggle and final victory over the powers of evil, "he came into Galilee preaching the gospel of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of heaven is at hand: repent ye, and believe the gospel." And I suppose that he really saw—that, as he preached, there shone for him the vision of a happier world. His own vivid consciousness of ideal things and the seeming response of the people to his appeal made that world a fact and no dream. It certainly was there in his own heart. The reign of peace and gladness and goodwill, the serene and ordered happiness which love and trust and quiet thoughts can create in the soul of man, was profoundly real to him. And this spiritual heaven, this kingdom of God that is within, would doubtless be so vividly present to his mind that he saw the actual world around him in the light and joy of that. Looking down on the blue lake and fertile plain, with that bright spring sky above him, the birds floating in the air, the flowers radiant at his feet, and the people wistful, expectant, and apparently so ready for the truth, how could he doubt that the kingdom of heavenly things was at hand? "Blessed," he said, "are the lowly in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of God." "Blessed are the gentle, for they shall inherit the earth." "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." He spoke out of a real and vital experience. He was in possession of this happiness; why should not others be? What was to hinder this joy from entering into their hearts, too? Only repent, he said—meaning by that a change of mind or of attitude towards life and the world—only change your ideal and look at things differently, and have a loftier aim and purpose in your life, and the peace of God is yours, the joy which love creates shall take up its abode within you—"a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth."

I think he expected, in those early days of his ministry, that men would at once receive this gospel of love and joy. In the glow of that springtime of hope, he speaks as one who believed that the door through which he had found entrance to this kingdom of beauty and peace had only to be thrown open for all men to enter. He seemed to see them flocking in with cheerful, willing footsteps. It was all so real and radiant to him—so simple, too, so easy and natural, that there was no reason why these homely folk of Galilee, and then others, from far as well as near, should not come to share with him the good that was offered so freely, without money and without price.

And thus he saw what I have ventured to call the "bright Galilean vision." How may we describe that vision to-day?

We know that a man's ideal—his highest conception of life—will be determined by two things—by his thought concerning the Power which creates, or is revealed in, the actual world, and by his thought of those who share life with him here. His idea of God and his idea of humanity—these will shape for him that vision of the good, which we call his "ideal."

When, on one occasion, Jesus is trying to dispossess the mind of that which so often mars the gladness of life, he said, "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing, and not one of them is forgotten before God? Fear not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows." Fear—that was man's great enemy; and he would dismiss it by faith in that goodness of love which seemed everywhere to pervade the world. He saw life illumined and transfigured by the great Father's smile. Over and within all the distortions and miseries and sins of life he felt the presence of an Eternal Power, which to him was an Eternal Goodness. In the first year of his ministry the light of God—the glory of a Divine spiritual beauty—must have shone for him in an unclouded splendour. The clear radiance of Love must have illumined even the darkest places of the world with its mystic and marvellous light. So that bright Galilean vision was in part a consciousness of the Divine Spirit as the supreme and all-controlling Power of the world, yet also the supreme Compassion—the unfailing loving-kindness of Life itself, as he discerned it from the deeps of a pure and serene heart.

And the other part of the vision was of human things—an ideal of humanity—the bold, impassioned insight of a Lover to whom the good appeared in all its fulness, triumphant over the ill.

It sometimes seems to me that Jesus must have looked on men, at first, in those glad days of hope, with something of child's eyes and a man's heart. He saw them, not as they are now to the realist, which is not what they truly are, but what to the idealist they may become, and are already, in the thought of God. He saw them as friends and lovers and comrades—as members of one family, or, as we should say now, the living units of the organic fellowship of life. Of course, to the outward vision, to the passing, critical, unsympathetic gaze, which penetrates but a little beneath the surface of things, human beings were a troubled and contentious race, selfish and self-seeking, often envious and unkind, petulant and pitiless—marring their own and others' happiness by strife and covetousness and cruelty. But to him, looking deeper and more lovingly, seeing within or beyond the outward forms and manners of daily life, they were sons of God, heirs of heaven, and therefore neighbours, brothers, friends.

You see, he found in himself this passion of human fellowship. It was an actual and vital fact of his own life, an experience about which he had no misgiving. And this love for all naturally found love in all; and these simple, commonplace folk, erring and wayward, restless and troubled, wandering and unhappy, "like sheep without a shepherd," were his own kith and kin, his own human brothers. And, thinking of them thus, he seemed to have no doubt that they must think of each other thus, or would, if they ceased to fear, and allowed the true human soul within them to utter itself. There was something entirely natural and reasonable in this. For to love men as brothers is, of course, to recognise them as possessors of a common nature with yourself, and, therefore, as capable of loving you and loving one another as brothers. The very idea of brotherhood is based on that of a common spiritual nature. That "mysterious humanity" which is "formed of other men like ourselves," and which is a unity and solidarity, to which the word man, or mankind, may be applied—that underlying element, which is common to all, is to the Lover nothing short of Love itself, or the stuff of which Love is made. "If I love them, they can love me and love one another," the lover thinks—and rightly.

Have there not been moments when we have all seen things thus? Have we not sometimes felt that, in spite of everything bad and base and ugly in human life, all men, of every race and every condition, were our fellows? And have we not then believed in our inmost minds that it was love in us and in them that bound us together in that common bond of humanity which makes the universal and world-wide fellowship of life?

Well, I think that Jesus must have had this feeling in all its strength and fulness, and that in him it was the constant and prevailing stimulus and motive of conduct—the commanding attitude of mind in which he approached men, and sought to minister to them and save them, as he himself was saved.

Of course, he could not fail to see that their lives were not actually ruled by this spirit of love. He saw them striving and contending one against another. He saw hatred and oppression, injustice and cruelty, hurting and spoiling their lives. But he saw this as the effect of a delusion. It was a condition of things born, not of real enmity or hate, but of fear—the fear of one another, or the fear that unless they fought with others they would not secure the really good and necessary things of life. He saw that covetousness—the passion for having things—was working all, or nearly all, this mischief and distress. He knew they were deceived, that their eyes were blinded. He knew in himself that there was no need to have much in order to be well off—that a man's life did not "consist in the abundance of things which he possesseth." He knew that men were not made happy by great possessions, or unhappy by few. He showed by one of his graphic parables that much goods laid up for many years did not mean much good to him for whom they were laid up. He had discovered that a very few things were really needful to life, that those who had but few were often happiest, and that if all were content with few there would be enough for all and no further occasion for strife and contention—that so hatred and unkindness would naturally and surely pass away.

The evils that distressed men were thus shown to be on the surface, while deep down the great Love which united all was mighty and resistless, and needed only to be set free to become the ruling and exultant spirit of Life.

With these thoughts in his heart, then, he comes forth preaching, with highest hope, his sweet Evangel of Love. For the first time (on this side of the Himalayas), men heard a gospel of perfect charity and absolute good-will, proclaimed with an almost childlike confidence that it would be received and responded to by those who heard.

And it was all a mistake, we say—a mirage, a dream. Let us not too hastily conclude thus. It could not be, then and there, as he was so soon to find; but it was none the less significant and beautiful.

He may have been at that time the only one living who possessed, in fulness of delight, these graces of the serene and loving spirit. There may have been none among his hearers who could respond to—who could even understand—that benediction of human kindness and sweet reasonableness and gentle thoughts. And he was soon to be undeceived. Instead of undeceiving men, in their stupid dream of happiness by pitiless and selfish gain, he was to be disillusioned himself. He was to learn that few, if any, could accept his hope or believe his gospel. He was to find himself rewarded for such thoughts by hatred and resistance, and to be dismissed from the scene amid the sneers and jeers of a malignant priesthood and a maddened populace. Nevertheless, the vision had shone for his clear spirit, radiant and beautiful as the dawn. The Ideal had been preached in words, and embodied in a life, with fearless and unfaltering resolve. And though it has never yet been realised in the world—though the centuries have rolled by, and the old strife and struggle for that which is not joy has gone on, and is going on still—yet the Christ-ideal lives and cannot die. And towards it in every age the hearts of the lowly and the loving turn, as to the highest, sweetest, noblest wisdom that ever ravished the heart or annointed the lips of man. And the name of him who possessed that wisdom and lived by its light and died for its truth—that name has been "not so much written as ploughed into the history of the human race."

And we may wisely try to hope that his spirit—for men have been too well content to preach and profess his name—we may try to hope that his spirit will yet triumph in human hearts, and that his bright Galilean vision will become the reality and the recompense of a world that has struggled at last into order and harmony and beauty and brotherhood and peace.

Warning from Liverpool.—A man calling himself a doctor, an American, short, stout, well dressed, dark in complexion, even to a touch of the African, is very successful in borrowing money, payable in x years. He talks Collyer, Armstrong, and others.

Ministers' Institute.—Owing to the Martineau Centenary meetings at Manchester College, it will not be possible for the Institute to assemble at its usual time in the Easter vacation. The Committee have, therefore, had to decide that arrangements should be made instead for the first week in July (3, 4, and 5), provided these dates be found convenient, and a sufficient number signify their intention to be present. Members are asked to accept this notice, and to kindly write at once to the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, Essex House, Campden-hill, London, W.

ON THE WINGS OF DELIGHT.—II.

Venice and Florence.

Out here at Fiesole we are some three miles, as the crow flies, from the heart of Florence, and looking down from our steep hill, more than 900 ft. above sea level, we have a glorious view over the city and the broad valley of the Arno to the hills beyond. The electric tram, starting from the Piazza del Duomo, takes about an hour to climb up by the long circuitous road; but one does not grudge the time, since the winding road, mounting higher and higher, brings a constant succession of wonderful views of the city or the lovely country that surrounds it, bounded on every side by the hills. Every morning early we can be down in Florence, amid its great memories and all the wealth of beauty and historic interest it contains. Here we have a sense of space and fresher air, and the city spread out below with endless variety of beauty in its changing aspects, in sunlight and shadow, morning and evening, at noon and in the quiet night. And if one lingers in the city after the last tram has gone, then to trudge, by the shortest way, the straight steep road up from San Domenico, with the brilliant lights of Florence shining below, and the silent stars above, and on the crest of the hill above the friendly beckoning of the lights of Fiesole, even at the end of a tiring day, is worth more than all the labour it entails.

We came here from Venice on Monday, April 3, a journey that repeated in crossing the Apennines much of the delight of the climb up from Innsbruck over the Brenner to Botzen. The mountains are not so great as in Tyrol, and there was less snow on the heights, but the windings of the railway up the valleys, past quaint villages and splendid mountain gorges, was a constant fascination. Earlier in the day, turning south from Padua, we ran along the base of Shelley's Euganean hills, which we had seen from Venice, or, rather, from the gondola across the waters of the lagoon, as we returned from the Lido and coasted round some of the smaller islands towards sunset. After Bologna on the journey south the climb began, and in the middle of a long tunnel we felt that we had crested the hill. At one little station where we had to wait for a belated train to pass, many of the passengers went out on the hillside gathering flowers. Then, after a time, came the first glimpse of Pistoja in the plain far below, and when the train had wound its way down we knew that we were not far from Florence.

To arrive for the first time in Florence and drive straight through the city, past the great Dominican Church of Santa Maria Novella, with a glimpse only of the Duomo and Giotto's glorious tower, past the old gate of San Gallo, through which Romola passed on that fateful morning when she fled from Florence and the arresting voice of Savonarola turned her back, and so to go straight out to Fiesole, would have been hard, if we had not known that we were not really going away. But it was a happy thought to make this our encampment, and it has given us much that we could not have had if we had stayed down in the city. No words can express the beauty of Florence with its domes and towers, seen from this height just after sun-rise on a brilliantly clear morning, or again on a cloudy morning, when there had been rain in the night, and gleams of sunshine touched the Duomo, and lay across the city, while the hills were still partly shrowded in the gloom. Nor has our stay here on the northern height prevented our seeing the city towards evening from the nearer height of San Miniato on the scuth, or from the beautiful Boboli gardens on a perfect evening, looking down upon the Arno with its quaint Ponte Vecchio and the other bridges, and all the great buildings, the Palazzo Vecchio, the Duomo with Giotto's campanile, Santa Croce and the rest.

It was to Giotto's tower that we first went on our first morning in Florence. Pictures had long made us familiar with its form, but no picture can reproduce the inexpressible loveliness of the thing itself, as it stands in the midst of the city, beside the great cathedral church and the venerable Baptistery, and as one looks up at it the pure white marble and the exquisite tracery of its windows seen against the blue sky. And this fairy thing is a tower, strong and noble. We went up, and from the top looked over Florence, while in stage after stage of the ascent new aspects of the Duomo with its wealth of decoration, also in white marble with the lines of black, appeared. Afterwards we went into the Duomo and the Baptistery, which was the original Cathedral of Florence, before the great revival towards the close of the thirteenth century, when the Dominicans built Santa Maria Novella, the Franciscans Santa Croce, and the whole city united, as Ruskin says, in the building of the new cathedral. That was the period not only of Giotto but of Dante, and the Florence that we see to-day cannot be separated from their memory, nor from that of the later Fra Angelico (who belonged to our Fiesole), and of Savonarola.

Then mid-day we crossed the Ponte Vecchio, but lingered for a time in the central open space, where the line of shops over the bridge is broken, to eat our lunch with frank simplicity (the ladies of the party were otherwise engaged, but we had an artist and a poet of our number), and to wash our fingers at the public pump; and thence to the Pitti, the first of the three great picture galleries of Florence which we visited.

Later in the afternoon three of us, after we had looked in at the Palazzo Vecchio, and seen the splendid modern statue of Savonarola in the great hall, found our way to the old Protestant Cemetery, where are the graves of Mrs. Browning, Clough, Landor, Southwood Smith, and Theodore Parker. They are all near together, and the whole cemetery, which has been closed now for many years, is quite small, being an oval which breaks the course of a broad road on the western side of the city. The ground rises as one goes in at the gate, and Parker's grave is near the centre, on the side looking towards Fiesole. The hills were lighted by the evening sun as we stood there in the quietness under the tall cypresses which overshadow the grave. Walter Savage Landor died in 1864, Parker in 1860, the other three in 1861. The inscription on Theodore Parker's grave is too well known to be repeated here. On Dr. Southwood Smith's are the following lines by Leigh Hunt:—

> Ages shall honour, in their hearts enshrined,
> Thee Southwood Smith, Physician of mankind,
> Bringer of Air, Light, Health into the home
> Of the rich Poor of happier years to come.

At the foot of Mrs. Browning's grave, which is marked simply by her initials, 'E. B. B. ob. 1861," and the beautiful medallion portrait cut in the white marble, Professor Knight recently planted some fresh roses (in "March, 1905"), but we cannot understand how he can have allowed the fact to be proclaimed by an ugly metal enamelled label, white enamel with a black border, tied on to the low rail which surrounds the grave.

The cemetery is not far from the road by which the electric tram for Fiesole leaves the city, and so we returned to our hill-top.

To attempt to tell of what we have done each day, and all that we have seen, would be wearisome, and most of it would be an oft-told tale. Into our week we have crowded most of the things that can by no means be overlooked, and we now know at least something of what Florence contains. To the Giotto frescoes at Santa Croce and Santa Maria Novella (frescoes by the master himself, or those of his school) we would gladly return again and again, and even more to the quiet cloisters and the cells of the monastery of San Marco, of which Savonarola was Prior, where so many wonderful frescoes by Fra Angelico are still to be seen. Of the other churches, that of Santa Maria del Carmine has left perhaps the most vivid impression, with the frescoes by Masaccio and Filippino Lippi, and the Badia, with the latter's beautiful picture of "Madonna appearing to St. Bernard." Then the three great picture galleries, the Pitti, the Uffizi, and the Accadémia. Looking back upon the pictures at Venice, it is chiefly the beautiful Madonnas of Bellini that one longs to remember, and such a masterpiece as Palma Vecchio's "Holy Family with SS. John the Baptist and Catherine," though Titian, of course, is great and Carpaccio fascinating; but in Florence there is so much more that rises to the loftiest beauty and touches the purest springs both of delight and of devotion and aspiration. There are the Raphaels, the "Madonna del Granduca" and the "Madonna della Sedia" in the Pitti, so exquisite in their tenderness and the mother's perfect grace, and in the Uffizi the "Madonna del Cardellino," in which the little John, who has brought a bullfinch in his hand to Jesus, appears as a merry, if not a mischievous little chap, simply excited at having caught the bird, but in the face of the baby Jesus there is a wonderful look of tenderness as he touches the bird, as though he would say, "Be very tender with it," or "Let it go." And then of the earlier masters, the "Paradise" of Fra Angelico in the Accadémia, if one looks into it, has the loveliest things, such as the ring of little children dancing among the flowers, and Fra Filippo Lippi's "Coronation of the Virgin," has no less exquisite groups of angel faces. With these we count the Madonnas of Botticelli as among the supreme treasures of Florence, and in his "Prima Vera" the group of the three Graces, a creation of the purest beauty which is wonderful to see.

We are glad to have been first at Venice, and to have come on to Florence. Venice was a dream of constant delight, and the splendour of San Marco stands by itself. Florence seems to be more austere, with a greater purity and elevation in its ideals, yet steeped in beauty, both of its lovely surroundings and of the works of its great masters. How could it be otherwise in the city of Dante and Giotto, of Savonarola and Fra Angelico?

It seems absurd to write even the briefest notice about Florence and not mention the name of Michael Angelo, or of della Robbia, and, indeed, many another; but this letter must be posted. It is Sunday morning, and we are going down into Florence, some of us to attend the morning service at the church across the river, of which our friend the Rev. Tony André is minister. To-morrow we start on a driving tour, by way of Vallombrosa, Arezzo, and Cortona to Siena.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN WARREN, LONDON.

On Saturday last, at the age of 73, Mr. John Warren, late of Lancaster-gate, and Handcross Park, Crawley, Sussex, a gentleman well known in City circles as well as in our own connection, passed away after a painful illness. Mr. Warren traced his descent through a long line of English Presbyterians, one of whom was the Rev. John Warren, of Coventry, early in the eighteenth century. His father was Mr. Thomas Pickard Warren, a silk manufacturer, a business long connected with the family. John, who was the eldest son, was educated at Hove House, Brighton, and University College. He graduated as B.A. and LL.B., but, like his ancestors, he entered business, and was identified with the firm of S. Courtauld & Co., manufacturers of crape, &c. He was also a director of the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Company. He was for many years a member of the Little Portland-street congregation, and occupied a position on several prominent charitable trusts, including Dr. Williams' (from 1867), Hackney College, and the Presbyterian Board. Of the last-named he was treasurer from 1867 to 1879, and again from 1898 to the date of his death, and he took a keen interest in its affairs. It is noteworthy that his grandfather, also named John, was a Dr. Williams' trustee from 1781 to 1804, and treasurer of the Presbyterian Board from 1784 to 1802, and his father was also a member of the Presbyterian Board from 1835 to 1867. Mr. Warren was a member of the Ironmongers' and Fishmongers' Companies, a Governor of St. Bartholomew's and St. Thomas's Hospitals, and other institutions, and a J.P. for Sussex. He was never married, but enjoyed the blessing of a wide circle of friends and relatives, who knew the sterling worth of his character. A man of strong views, he found much to disagree with in modern tendencies, but under an exterior sometimes brusque, he maintained a kindly disposition that often showed itself in an old-world grace and courtesy.

MRS. GREENHOW.

THE Mill Hill congregation of Leeds has just lost its oldest member, the last survivor of a noble generation identified with the chapel for more than seventy years.

Mrs. Ann Greenhow, the daughter of Willliam Lupton, merchant, of Leeds, was born on March 1, 1812. In 1854 she became the second wife of Dr. Thomas Michael Greenhow, an eminent physician of Newcastle-on-Tyne. After his retirement from practice they came to live in Leeds, where he died in 1881, in the 90th year of his age, and in honour of all to whom his name and work were known.

Of Mrs. Greenhow's five brothers there would be much to tell, for each one of them was eminent in their native town, and they were for many years the foremost supporters and representatives of the congregation to which they belonged. Of herself there is little to be told, and that little she would rather have withheld from publicity. A sweet, happy, useful, kindly life which won the reverent love of all who had the privilege of her friendship—this is her ample record.

Very frail in body during her later years, and, indeed, she was always delicate, she was blessed with the full possession of her intellectual faculties to the very last. Towards the end her hearing was impaired, and she could not see enough to read or write, but she kept her life-long interest in the congregation and all that concerned it. THE INQUIRER was read to her regularly, as well as the Monthly Sermon and Record. And she loved to hear of all that concerned the members of her large family and her many poor friends and dependents.

She "fell asleep"—the trite expression exactly describes her sweet end—on Saturday afternoon, April 8. Her body was laid beside that of her husband in the Roundhay Churchyard.

MORAL fidelity and sympathetic service to others—two things which go far to make up that noblest way of living which Jesus called the Kingdom of God.—G. S. Merriam.

"A CRIPPLED and suffering child, looked at from without, seems the heaviest of domestic afflictions. Yet once confided to our care, what an object of tender interest it becomes. 'What gentle and holy affections hover over it.' 'What a web of soft and fostering duty is woven round it.' It gives new beauty and value to life. We would fain keep it with us for ever What a void is left, when it is removed by death. The heart then learns the deep blessing of sorrow, ill exchanged for the drier interests and the tasteless pleasures that must now come in its place."—John James Tayler.

THE CENTENARY MEETINGS AT NORWICH.

DEAR SIR,—Will you kindly permit me a word re the Norwich Martineau Memorial Celebrations and the Memorial itself?

(1) Since the programme (see advertisement) was sent out, one alteration and two additions have been made to it. On Saturday, April 22, the visit to the Cathedral must (to suit the time of the special cathedral service) take place at 2 p.m., not at 2.30, as stated in the programme. The party will leave the cathedral at 2 45, and proceed to Bracondale Woods, the grounds of which (by kind permission of R. J. Colman, Esq.) will be open. Thence they will pass to (the adjacent) Carrow Abbey, to view the older portion and grounds of which they will be welcomed by kind invitation of Mr. James Stuart.

(2) On Saturday evening, at 8 o'clock, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed has kindly offered to lecture on "Wordsworth" (in aid of the building fund) in the Octagon Institute. As the room is not large early application for tickets is advisable (for prices see advertisement).

(3) As Norwich, in common with most places, has only one early morning postal delivery on Good Friday, and we are anxious to announce a full list of subscriptions and promises to the Memorial Building Fund at the public meeting that evening, is it too much to ask intending donors kindly to post early on Thursday (or, if at considerable distance, on Wednesday) next week?—Yours faithfully,

(MRS.) F. A. MOTTRAM, Hon. Sec.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

SIR,—In my last letter detailing excursions which might be taken from Geneva during the first week, in several places you printed "train" where I had written "tram."

SECOND WEEK.—How may we spend the second week when the meetings are over? The answer will depend on what kind of holiday the visitor requires. Rest and refreshment to recruit health is one thing; sight-seeing is another. The rest-holiday is the cheapest; in fact, the expense will be less than half of moving from place to place.

For health and rest take this: The meetings will be over on Thursday, August 31. On Friday, September 1, steamer from Geneva to Nyon on the left of the lake, about two hours' sail. A diligence (mail coach) leaves the Post Office twice a day for St. Cergues, a village in the Jura mountains, 3,432 ft., or 2,202 ft. above the lake. It is a lovely ride, the views widening as you ascend. The village is situated in a hollow in the hills, and the air is so pure and invigorating that during August it is always crowded. The views of the lake and mountains are simply charming, Mont Blanc being always in sight. Pensions will take us for five, six, or seven francs a day. They are all good. Nothing can be more charming and healthful than a week spent in this mountain seclusion, and it has the advantage of being within easy reach of Geneva. But early application is necessary to secure accommodation.

For those who would like to go further afield the following may be recommended:—Steamer to Montreux, about four hours' sail. Visit the Castle of Chillon—if you have not seen it during the first week—which can be reached in a few minutes by electric tram. Then train to Aigle, where it may be necessary to stay the night. Three hours' ride by diligence to Sepey, a village, 3,704 ft., surrounded by beautiful walks. The pensions are most reasonable, and the mountain air is refreshing. Mont d'Or rises from the village. A week here will be more beneficial than a week at the seaside. On the return journey to Geneva, by leaving the train at Montreux, the tourist may visit Glion, and walk back through the Gorge du Chaudron, mentioned in my former letter, and then take steamer or train to Geneva. Either of these will be enough for an extra week's rest and refreshment.

For those who are bent on sight-seeing I recommend the following:—Train from Geneva to Chamonix, four hours' journey through an interesting country. Here we are at the foot of Mont Blanc, which rises 12,285 ft. above the valley. The hotels are all good, and there will be no difficulty in finding one to suit our means. Two or three days should be spent here to visit the Mer de Glace and the Glacier des Bossons. A day will be required for each. To visit the Mer de Glace we ascend the Montanvert (6,303 ft.), a walk of about two and half hours on a good road, from the top of which we look down on this wonderful sea of ice. Ladies, or those who are not good walkers, may ascend on horseback. We may return from this point if we like; or we may continue the journey by crossing the glacier, walking along the Mauvais Pas to the Chapeau. Some interest is added to this walk on the Mauvais Pas by the fact that if we are not careful we have a chance of breaking our necks. But ladies do the journey every day. From the Chapeau we have a splendid view of the Chamonix valley. It is a good walk down, but it may be done on a horse, which must be previously engaged. The Glacier des Bossons is three hours' journey there and back from Chamonix. Mounting the steps cut in the ice and crossing the glacier is a bit exciting, as there is such a chance of a slip, but a pair of socks drawn over the boots (they may be purchased for a franc from a man at the hut) will make all safe.

Three or four days are now gone. The next day may be spent in a carriage drive over the Tête Noir Pass, or a walk over the Col de Balme. The carriage drive is not expensive when divided among a party, and such is the romantic grandeur of the scenery that everyone feels it is money well spent. It is not so high (4,997 ft.) as the Col de Balme, but it is more romantic. The drive from Chamonix to Martigny will occupy nine hours. The Col de Balme must be done on foot, and is a walk of nine hours to Martigny or Vernayaz. The view of Mont Blanc and its companion mountains from the highest point (7,225 ft.) is so magnificent that words cannot describe it. It will be necessary to spend the night at Martigny or Vernayaz, unless we have started very early in the morning.

At Vernayaz a visit may be paid to the Gorge du Trient, which is close by. Then the train must be taken to Montreux, from which we may visit the Castle of Chillon, Glion, and the Gorge du Chaudron, or we may go by the mountain train to the summit of the Rochers de Naye (6,858 ft.), affording a wonderful panorama of lake and mountains. If we have seen Chillon and Glion the first week, and want something quiet, we may mount the electric tram, and ride along the edge of the lake to Vevey. We may take the steamer or train here for Geneva; or, if we have time, call at Ouchy (by boat), or Lausanne by train, and see the cathedral, or ascend the Signal, as mentioned last time. Of course it must be understood that the round here sketched may be taken the reverse way, and, indeed, Chamonix is more impressive when approached from the Tête Noir or Col de Balme than from Geneva.

Third Week.—From Martigny by train along the Rhone Valley to Brieg. Diligence, past the Rhone Glacier over the Furka Pass (7,990 ft.) to Göschenen, where we stay the night. Next day on the St. Gothard railway—a wonderful ride—to Flüelen, at the foot of the lake of Lucerne, where the steamer will be in waiting to take us along this magnificent lake to Lucerne. The hotels at Lucerne are dear, but it is a charming place. If we stay here long it will be necessary to take the train right back to Geneva, which will take a big piece out of a day. But by economising time we may go by train to Interlaken over the Brünig Pass. The next day steamer to Spiez on Lake Thun, carriage to Kandersteg, then a walk over the Gemmi Pass (7,265 ft.) to the Baths of Leuk, then a carriage to Leuk Station in the Rhone Valley, where we take the train to Geneva. All this may be done by leaving Geneva as soon as the meetings are over, and economising time at each place. Those who do not care to do so much, or would like to linger a longer time at Lucerne or Interlaken, may take the train at either place for Geneva. Like Mr. Lawford, I am willing to give more definite information on receipt of a stamped envelope. I would advise your readers who think of going to preserve all the letters on the subject for future use.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I promised to tell you some more stories on the same subject as the last: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."

There was a poor widow who had two boys; she made artificial flowers for her living; and though she had to work hard and for long hours she managed just to keep a home together in one room for herself and her boys. But the fashion changed, and flowers were hardly wanted at all, and she was turned off from the place where she had worked so long. Far and near she sought for work, till almost in despair; and meanwhile she could hardly feed her boys, and could not get them any clothes. Some friends helped her, and got her a knitting machine, which she learnt to use; but, though she earned a little, it was not nearly enough for the three to live on. So without saying anything to his mother, Harry, the elder boy, went out and got himself a place at a newsshop, and early before school and late in the evening he was out delivering papers, or sweeping out the shop. In this way they just managed to live; but Harry was not strong, and he grew tall and pale and thin; and whenever there were a few pence over his mother wanted to get the boys a little something for a treat for their tea; but Harry wouldn't hear of it, and said, "Don't spend it, mother; keep it, we may want it by and by." As soon as ever Harry was old enough to leave school he got himself engaged as office boy to a gentleman who had taught in the Sunday school, and thus he earned ten shillings a week. But, though he came home very tired at night, he was off directly after his tea to the Polytechnic for lessons; and when he came back from these he worked till late preparing lessons for the next day, and got up early in the morning to prepare again before going to work; for he wanted to pass an examination to get a situation in the Post Office, where he would have good pay. Week after week he worked with all his might; his mother knew it was too much for him, for he grew irritable and nervous, and in his sleep he talked of his lessons, but nothing would stop him. When the examination came he did well, and was placed on the list of candidates; but there were hundreds of other lads trying, and Harry's name was some way down on the list; and soon he heard that he had not been high enough up to get a place. It was a terrible disappointment; but he set to work at once for the next examination. Again he was not high enough up in the list, and failed to get a place. I can't tell you all the self-denials that he and his mother went through, or how great a strain it was: meanwhile little Arthur was steadily sent to school, neat and tidy, every day. At last one evening the good lad came to see me, and told me that he had got through successfully, and got a place in the Post Office! How happy he was! he nearly cried as he told me. Next day he went to work; but he was only a week or so there when he fell ill, with a sad illness from which he never recovered, and of which he died.

There is a story by Miss Yonge called "Kenneth," about the retreat in 1812 of Napoleon's "Grand Army" from Russia. Kenneth and his little sister Effie were taken charge of in the retreat by a French officer and his nephew, Louis, a very young officer of about eighteen; and the whole party suffered terribly on the march, in snow and bitter cold, crossing rivers on broken ice, sleeping out of doors, having scarcely any food, and that mostly horse-flesh. They grew terribly weak and exhausted; but the officers and a rough man named Léon, who had the children given into his charge, were indescribably good and kind to them, and most tender in their care of the little girl. Louis was a delightful young fellow, and became a great friend to the poor boy and girl. One night when they were sadly exhausted they came to a village where every house was filled with soldiers, and even the church, too, and they were obliged to stay in the churchyard. They managed to collect some sticks, and made a fire; but in vain they sought for food—there was none to be had. That morning Louis had given part of his scanty meal to Effie, and kept one single oat-cake for supper. This oat-cake was all they had. Louis was dying of starvation; but when a bit of the oat-cake was offered to him by Effie he thanked her, and said, "No, no, eat it yourself; I mean to make rest serve instead of food," and he stretched himself on a grave for his bed; and saying good-night to all, and murmuring a last "Good-night, mother," to her who would never see her boy again, he fell asleep. It was a sleep from which he never woke on earth; for for about midnight they found him with a beautiful calm face, but with his loving spirit fled.

Poor Effie could not bear to think that she had eaten the whole oat-cake; and the next day when they got a little food again they said, "If we had but had this yesterday!"

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

This sort of trial does not very often come to us; but there is not one of us who can be prepared to behave nobly in great things unless he has been used all his life to self-denial in little things. They are the little steps by which a child learns to walk before he can climb the mighty mountains. We call them "little things," but they often seem great at the time. A little girl may silently give up a pleasure on which she was counting, to stay by her sick mother, and her little brother, seeing her do so, may give up his pleasure, too, in order to be at hand to help her.

In any great disaster, such as a shipwreck, you see at once the difference between the selfish man who has not been used to think of others, and only tries to save himself, and the good captain who has the charge of so many lives, who waits to see every one safe, though his own turn to escape may never come.

Shall we not ask in everything, "What would Jesus do?" and remember his words, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross."

THE SHADOW AND THE LIGHT:

BEFORE another week has passed we shall be witnesses again of one of those multitudinous movements that characterise our Bank-holiday times. The eccentricity of the ecclesiastical calendar has rendered the interval between the last old-year holiday and the first of the new more than usually long; but, if the delay has intensified the desire to play, it brings a compensation in the advanced spring-tide. There is a haze of green in all the woodlands, and favoured spots are already full of leaf. Familiar wildflowers glance from the hedgerows, and well-remembered notes of birds ripple from the coppices. A fringe of new and tender verdure along the top of the cliffs seems to bring a suggestion of newness even to the azure of the sea that never grows old. Over all is a canopy of softer sky. The country-side is filled with a bewildering beauty.

Meanwhile, as vague thoughts of hill and dale and breezy moor come into the minds of many an intending holiday-maker, thoughts of a very different kind come at this time to others. For the week just beginning is Passion-week, of all weeks of the year to them the most sacred. On the very day when first the released toilers will fling themselves by millions into the delights of the long-contemplated holiday, multitudes of earnest worshippers will gather to keep holy-day of quite another sort. Good Friday will be good to them, not because it will be a day on which it will be specially good to live, but because it tells of an ever-memorable death. There may be sunlight and carols of birds without, but within the church there will be gloom and the wail of penitence.

According to temperament and use, it is possible to judge either group very unwisely. Doubtless there is much in the holiday-making that might be better; and equally doubtless there are features of the Good Friday services here and there that do not wholly satisfy. Let each man be fully persuaded in his own mind. One wise man will bow in the shadow, another will walk abroad in the light; both may be wise, and to each there shall come, if he be really wise, reminders, not unprofitable, of the other's mood.

Assuredly there is a shadow even upon the paths of spring. Call it, if you will, "the shadow of the Cross," find, if you can, an explanation of the pains of nature in some moral catastrophe big with the fate not only of man but of the world in which he dwells; or leave the problem unsolved—it is still there. Why these sorrows in a world that can smile so sweet? Why do these very toilers spend the greater part of their days in such drudgery, and, even when respite comes, have so little pleasure in life as a whole that their chief desire is to forget? And while we ourselves ramble, and climb the hills, and fill our lungs on the breezy heights, yonder away in the town there are prisoners of sickness, the bruised and languid brethren, the desperately crushed and dwarfed souls that have not courage enough left in them to get out of their usual squalid, or, at least, uninteresting, surroundings. In deeper darkness still, the "sin of the world" lies there to trouble us—the greed, vice, cruelty, man's inhumanity to man. And even out here, in the fields and under cover of the smiling day, are the easily detected marks of struggle, pain, and death.

In the Church ascends the mournful cry, "O Lamb of GOD, that takest away the sin of the world." The pressure of the burden of this unintelligible world is felt there with the added emphasis of a troubled conscience. Its weight and significance are not a whit lessened by the refinements of our modern theology. We have discarded the Fall, and our logic finds no need of an everlasting Hell as the fitting correlative to the wicked life. But the facts that built up these hypotheses in men's thought are as real to-day as in any day past. Bring in heredity to explain evil tendencies, discuss evolution as a scheme of rationalising the irrational, be as wise as you can with all modesty and patience, still the shadow is there. Tell us it is but a figment of the imagination, that nothing is bad but thinking makes it so, we can but answer that our dream is the only reality we know, and it hurts as much as if we were awake. There is a mark of transiency in all things. Some fatal defect, it would seem to us, is at the heart of things. If the great sacrifice on Calvary had but taken away the sin of the world! But the shadow remains; sin and pain and death are to us, in all their essentials, just as they were to the men of old time.

So we think or might think. But is it wholly so? Look around. The frail loveliness of spring, over whose transience we grow pensive, is potent to shatter all our pessimism. If it were not so lovely, if the great grim world would never smile so at us, we might dub it monster, and defy it. But in the hour when we are saddest, there blooms a lily, or falls a sunbeam, or a little child laughs, or a strong friend's cheery voice hails us, and then, somehow, all mechanical theories of life are smashed into ruin. The light of life, ever-mysterious, tantalising, reassuring, gleams across the shadowed path. The Calvaries of the sad earth strangely leave upon our heart a deeper feeling than sadness. If human nature, like this outer scene, had been less lovely, if no CHRIST had lived and died, how easy it would be to grip ourselves into our place amid the cog-wheels of the universe, and stoically purpose that at least it should never make us weep. But when our beloved ones are dear to us, never dearer than when they die, when we see the SON OF MAN radiant with the light of unspeakable compassion and sympathy, our stoicism breaks down, and a nobler mood prevails. Deliverance is at hand. Whatever be the solution of the world-mystery, it must take account of beauty and of love. In the sanctuary, or among the hawthorn bushes, we may indeed take shadow with us or find it there, but still the light meets us, light inescapable, and, we must believe, destined to conquer.

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

MARTINEAU AND THE PRINCIPLES OF CHURCH UNION:

IT is vain to disguise the fact that James Martineau was during the greatest part of his life regarded by his co-religionists with misgiving and suspicion, as one who endeavoured to lead men away from plain issues which they understood into considerations which did not answer the question—"Why am I a Unitarian?" He was in many minds bracketed with Maurice, and called mystical or misty according to the speaker's fancy; and this collocation more than anything else gave birth to the surmise that Martineau's heart was in the Church of England all the time. Probably the complaint most frequently made, with some irritation, during his life, and repeated with genuine regret since his death, is one quite compatible with admiration of his commanding abilities, namely, that he might have devoted those abilities to the organisation of a very definite Unitarian church, and ensured for it a prominent place among the forces of Dissent; and he would not.

And he had promised so well in his beginnings! In his first settlement (Dublin, 1828–32), he had taken the leading part in founding and organising the Irish Unitarian Society, and this, a society of not merely of individuals, but distinctly contemplating the representation of congregations. As its delegate and secretary, he attended a meeting of the Unitarian Association in Manchester, June, 1830, and no doubt heard of the high satisfaction with which his efforts had been regarded by the Association at its Anniversary Meeting held just before in London. But here we may pause for a moment to note that the prospectus of the Irish Unitarian Association was a very able document, of extreme definiteness on certain points, yet calculated to include both the Arian and Socinian elements of the constituency to which it appealed, and commending to both alike the term Unitarian as fitted to unite on "one grand principle" those who are divided by "minor shades of sentiment." How much of this proceeded from the secretarial pen, it is hard to say, but I think we shall have no hesitation in attributing to Martineau the resolution which he proposed at the opening meeting, March 17, 1830, in which, as in the speech that followed, he struck the keynote of that advocacy of Principle before Opinion which sounded through all his life. Here is the resolution :—

"That while professing attachment "to the principles of Unitarian Christian- "ity, we prize yet more that privilege of "free inquiry from the exercise of which "they spring; regarding it as the noblest "prerogative of religious beings, we "purpose, in our language and our "conduct, fearlessly to use it for ourselves, "and habitually to reverence it as the "equal right of others; to resist every "open encroachment, and protest against "all secret influence, which may interfere "with this boon from the God of truth."

And here is a fragment of the speech :—

"The spirit of system not only interfered "with the liberty of others by disposing "men to petty persecution, but made "slaves of its own friends, by impeding "the full and free action of the mind, "and constraining it into accordance with "the ponderous evolutions of a sect. "It effaced the delicate hues of individual "sentiment, and melted them down into "the broad and vulgar glare of party- "colour. It destroyed the individual "energy of conscience on which all excel- "lence of character was based, and sunk "men into mere passive portions of the "great machine of social life, without "any separate spring of motion when "detached from the moving mass. He "trusted that the Society now formed "would form a noble example of union "without bigotry, and moderation without "imbecility; that, however attached to "Unitarian Christianity, it would so "highly appreciate conscientious research "as to prefer the errors of the inquiring, "to the truths of the blind partisan. "The principle of free inquiry was not "understood by the lukewarm enemy "to all controversy. : : : Men little "knew the injury they did either in check- "ing controversy or changing its natural "course. Free discussion and free inquiry "were kindred rights; their promise "was written on the same page in the char- "ter of human freedom; and the hand "that would tear away the one would "inevitably cancel the other."

I lay stress on these things because Martineau is, or was, often spoken of as having been an earnest Unitarian once, and an indifferent one later; whereas in truth the statement and defence of Unitarianism went pari passu with a demonstration of the dangers of a new orthodoxy. Another example is not far to seek. Soon after his settlement in Liverpool he preached before the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire held in Manchester, June, 1834, and presided at the Ministers' dinner. The sermon moved The Christian Reformer to an admiration which was not destined to often wake again, and a regret "that the request to allow the discourse to be printed was not complied with, for a more beautiful delineation of our faith it has never been our lot to hear." But this admiration is by no means extended to the speech from the chair "on the present position of the Unitarians as being too sectarian as not allowing of sufficient latitude in theological sentiment, as virtually proclaiming and pledging any regular attendant at their places of worship to be a Unitarian. He contrasted with this the name, and in its best days the spirit, of English Presbyterianism, which bound to no particular religious belief, and thus was calculated to realise the idea of Christians meeting as men anxious to have their moral wants supplied, rather than as sectarians desirous of having their theological opinions supported."

This is all that is reported concerning this speech; but it is enough to show us that already Martineau was in open protest against "the Unitarian Church" in any form, and that he was beginning to quote Presbyterian precedent in a way that was readily misunderstood. It was quite enough for the Reformer, which proceeds to allay its qualms by printing in full the speech in which Dr. Beard "replied to this reasoning." A month before, when preaching in London the annual sermon of the Unitarian Association, Martineau had told its members that the future to which they should look forward was not the ascendency of one sect but the harmony of all; when "our work will be done, our reward before us, and our little community of reformers lost in the wide fraternity of enlightened and benevolent men."

The year 1836 saw the withdrawal of the Presbyterian ministers in and about London from the body of Three Denominations. The acrimonious feeling mainly stirred up by the Manchester Socinian Controversy had rendered the further co-operation of Unitarians with orthodox dissenters practically impossible. An attempt was made to preserve the historical connection by the formation of an English Presbyterian Association, which, while proclaiming an unlimited right of private judgment, tied up Christian Communion to "the one great principle of the Divine mission of our Lord." There seemed to be an opportunity, and certainly a need, for closing up the Unitarian ranks. An Aggregate Meeting of Unitarians was held in London June 19, 22, 1838, to consider especially the expediency of closer union and more general co-operation between Unitarians, and such changes in the Unitarian Association as might possibly make it efficient to this end. No very definite proposals were submitted. Mr. James Yates appears to have been almost alone in testifying to the pressing need of church government, control, and discipline. A suggestion for making the Association the recipient and publisher of reports from every Unitarian congregation in the country found more favour; but this scheme had been already judged and condemned by the West Riding Unitarians, when they expressed their fears that such associations, though at first only desiring reports would afterwards exact them, and finally judge them, and discerned in a meeting constituted for such a purpose an embryo Synod. Martineau spoke twice; his longer speech was on the second day. I fear it was regarded by many as containing "vague, German, transcendental notions," (to quote the phrase used on this occasion by Mr. Madge to describe some statements of Mr. Tayler's, which certainly appeared to the reader to be perfectly clear and simple). Martineau points out (and the remark must have been particularly appropriate at the time) that as Unitarianism was originally born of doubt, controversy, and revolt against current orthodoxy, and this character clings to it in each subsequent period and occasion of its success, so, when its adherents passed into the settled faith on which the religious life is built, and the noise of theological strife gave way to the harmonies of sympathy and charity, the terms which connoted the differentia of a sect did not describe the essence of church life, and cannot, from the postulates of the case, take the place, in a community based on free inquiry, which creed holds in churches based on authority.

The Aggregate Meeting separated without any very practical results; but an impression was left in many minds that some sort of a Unitarian church constitution would have been created if Martineau had not prevented it. It seems to me that this feeling is to be held largely accountable for the fact that his splendid polemics in the Liverpool Controversy, which immediately ensued, were so little appreciated, and that the volume "Unitarianism Defended" (of which Mr. Gordon justly says that it "raised controversial writing on this topic to a higher level of literary expression and intellectual eminence than it had previously attained to in Great Britain") was generally ignored by the Unitarian public. But it was a very fortunate thing that the Aggregate Meeting did not result in a Unitarian corporation of churches. It was, in fact, an attempt to organise a battalion already under fire. During the next five years the Unitarian host was putting away its new colours and finding up certain old ones, to which of late nothing but an archæological value had been attached. The right of Unitarians to the administration of old Presbyterian trusts was judicially denied in the Hewley and Wolverhampton cases, and the same challenge was now pressed in the direction of ousting them from the possession of meeting-houses and endowments of like origin, in the case of the Attorney-General v. Shore. And the vindication of possession was to be sought in evidence of unbroken inheritance through families of the old Dissent, set forth in numerous petitions and affidavits, and the contention that these chapels never stood for doctrinal uniformity, but for permitted development; for recognised latitude of opinion, which, however, had its abiding nucleus in "the spirit of English Presbyterianism at its best." In this line of defence, which was to be embodied in the Dissenters' Chapels Bill, intended to bar future proceedings for ejection, Martineau took a deep interest. He hoped much from the formation of a new Presbyterian Association. He thought that the Unitarian might now and henceforth be impressed with the fact that he did not occupy ancient chapels like Toxteth, Cross-street, and Mill Hill, as Unitarian freeholds; but that his was a fiduciary ownership, with a prime responsibility for seeing that the property and endowments should pass on from present holders to future generations without any infringement or modification of inherited freedom. But he was saddened to find then, as he often found subsequently, that this was a hard saying and not easy to be understood. The current belief in the Unitarian mind was that a wise Providence had left these trusts open, and guided the thoughts of the worshippers in these ancient chapels until they became Unitarians; then what need of any more progress, or any more Providence? Now we can make them Unitarian chapels to the end of time. This view actually found its way into the Dissenters' Chapels Bill as read in the House of Lord. A usage of twenty years was to suffice to turn an open-trust chapel into a Unitarian chapel for ever. The inconsistency of praising a liberal principle in your ancestors which you do not intend to put into practice yourself did not escape the sharp eye of Henry Philpotts, Bishop of Exeter; and he did not lose the chance of turning it to account. "My lords," he said, "the petitioners insist that the true measure of justice in this case is that there should be no restriction whatever with regard to religious opinions. I therefore might fling these petitions at the noble and learned lord's (Brougham) face if I could do it with civility, for never was a measure devised, nor could any measure ever be devised, more repugnant than this measure is to the very petitions which are brought forward in support of it. What, my lords, is the effect of this Bill? That a usage for twenty years shall fix for ever the doctrines to be taught in these chapels; a measure which would be a bar to the establishment of that right and title which they say are essential to the principles of toleration." The Bill was amended in the Commons, and this blemish removed, largely through the good offices of Lord Sandon and Mr. Cardwell; the former stated the case for amendment thus concisely:—"We must take care while we are intending to maintain the freedom of private judgment in these congregations that we are not in the meanwhile imposing a new test. We must take care, while we make the usage of a certain number of years the interpreter of the original intentions of the founder, we are not binding congregations professing particular opinions in such a manner that they will never be able to depart from these opinions hereafter."

It may be useful to remind the reader that the effect of the Bill as passed into law is, briefly, this:—Where no test or dogmatic condition has been imposed by the terms of a chapel trust, any suit for ejecting the tenant congregation on the ground that the doctrine now held by it is not that of the founder shall be barred by evidence that such doctrine has been taught unchallenged for the twenty-five years immediately preceding the date of the suit; and that such usage shall furnish a presumption that such doctrine is "proper to be taught," and that the founders' intention is not thereby violated.

And so the Unitarian congregations remained undisturbed in the ancient meeting-houses. The English Presbyterian Association was dissolved, and the Unitarian Association was left in possession of the field. The effort to make it a corporation of churches was gradually resumed; many besides myself will remember how the roll of congregations was called over at the commencement at the annual meetings until this was stopped by Martineau's sententious argument that a doctrinal association cannot be a non-subscribing church.

Among the number of carefully balanced declarations that might be quoted, in which Martineau emphasises at once the duty of a consistent testimony to truths of conviction and of a careful withholding of any prejudgment of the future, none is more noteworthy than the address delivered in 1848, on the occasion of the laying of the foundation-stone of the new church in Hope-street, Liverpool. After declaring that the church is dedicated to no priestly office, to no magnifying of personal influence, to no creed, he continues:—

"How plainly is it the law of Providence "that there should be a perpetual change, "be it cycle or be it progress, in the forms "under which the same indestructible "ideas operate in our nature! It is time "that this should be openly recognised as "fact, and allowed for in our provision "for the future. : : : Not—let me "be understood—that we are individually "without definite belief or collectively "without a belief strongly marked by "common characteristics. We do not "pretend to be mere seekers, with a system "awaiting us in the future. We are not "drawn together by the sympathies of a "universal unsettledness, and the resolve "to discuss an infinite number of open "questions. No; we raise here not a "school, but a church, not a hall of debate, "but a shrine of God, and shall collect not "a parliament of critics, but a brotherhood "of worshippers. : : Let it not be said "that we want a refuge for vagueness of "conviction, an excuse for cowardice of "profession. We know what we believe; "we love what we believe; we plainly tell "what we believe. I am a Unitarian; "you who will meet here from week to "week are doubtless Unitarian too; but "the society of worshippers of which we "are only the living members, and the "church erected here of which we are only "the transient tenants, these are not to be "defined as Unitarian. To stamp them "with such doctrinal name would be to "perform an act of posthumous expulsion "against many noble dead whom it is an "honour to revere; and perhaps to pro-"voke against ourselves from a future age "the retribution of a like excommunica-"tion."

I cannot resist the temptation to bring into close connection with this statement a further pronouncement on the subject of the Unitarian name as applied to chapels and congregations, which is to be found in the second of the two printed letters addressed to the Rev. S. F. Macdonald, under the titles "The Unitarian Position" and "Church Life or Sect Life?" (1859). These letters record the result of long reflection on the ecclesiastical aspect of Unitarianism, of many protests, and of several disappointments.

"I hope it is apparent by this time that "in protesting against the ecclesiastical "assumption of a dogmatic name I am "influenced by no depreciating estimate "of doctrinal theology in general or of "Unitarian principles in particular. The "question is not about the importance of "this or that discriminative doctrine, but "about the propriety of fixing any "polemically selected doctrine as the "permanent essence of Church life. Were "every characteristic of my own theology, "all that I most distinctly and positively "hold, picked out, endowed with some "adequately expressive name, and put "into the same position, my protest "would lose nothing of its earnestness: "As for the word Unitarian, it is a good "one, when you want to mark the particu-"lar side of theology to which it refers, "and to speak of people by their theologi-"cal classification. So long as the idea of "a saving orthodoxy regulates the lan-"guage of Christendom, and fixes curiosity "more upon the creed than upon the life "of men, the world will perhaps describe "us by this name or by that of 'Socinian.' "But it belongs to our ecclesiastical "protest against the whole notion of "orthodoxy to accept neither, to insist on "deposing the differences of creed from "their monstrous usurpation, to draw "forth into just prominence the spiritual "and moral conditions in which alone our "relation to God is realised, and in the "name of Christ to proclaim a church of "goodness, love, and heavenly-minded-"ness."

A few words must now be said with regard to the attempts in which Martineau was interested and the suggestions which originated with himself, in the direction of some "higher synthesis," some basis for religious union and co-operation which should be free from the complications introduced at every turn by a liberal communion with a dogmatic name. The first of these efforts was the formation of the Free Christian Union (1867–1870). A proposal that the Unitarian Association should at its annual meeting proceed to define its Unitarian Christianity, led to a direct challenge being given to Martineau to lead those who were like-minded with himself into some less embarrassed sphere of religious communion. "A following neither feeble nor few" was readily enlisted, but the members were never truly agreed as to the purpose which brought them together—whether the union was to be significant of movement, or to represent only a restful sympathy. It is no discredit to Martineau to say that the break-up of the Union was largely due to him. He estranged its clerical supporters by his inability to understand how the Broad Church man, who warmly shared his own aspiration for wide religious communion, could decline all overt protest against subscription and the recital of creeds in public worship. I well remember that after a speech at a meeting at the Freemasons' Tavern in which Martineau had stated this with all his vigour and with no tact whatever, Mr. J. R. Green, then vicar of St. Philip's, Stepney, remarked to a brother clergyman: "This is no place for us"; and they left the room.

I have often thought that for Martineau the Church of England, as it is at present, possessed no charm. He frequently worshipped with Presbyterians and with Congregationalists, but very seldom, I opine, in an English parish church. The whole conception of the Prayer Book worship as turning upon penitence and absolution was distasteful to him, in fact, directly opposed to his own, as everyone who has read the preface to Hymns for the Christian Church and Home will remember; and he once characterised the language of the book itself as being at once verbose and bald. Long ago, in "The Battle of the Churches" (1851), he had discounted the claims of the Church of England until nothing was left that enlisted his regard except its National character. The idea of a comprehensive National Church lived in his mind and produced in his later years an ideal scheme, which nevertheless struck many minds as practical, if not now, yet hereafter. It was Presbyterian in essence—historically, not technically; an enlarged Protectorate Settlement, an application of Baxter's Worcestershire Agreement to Anglican and Nonconformist alike, involving State recognition of co-ordinated religious bodies, which, while adhering to their own predilections in matters of doctrine and ritual, are subject alike to State regulations, especially with regard to the character and educational status of their clergy. This scheme was expounded in the Contemporary Review (July, 1886) under the title, "The Expansion of the Church of England." Just as the Presbyterians, when denied comprehension in the Church, endeavoured a comprehensive Dissent, so Martineau turned from his National Church scheme to consider the possibilities of a "Catholic Non-Conformity." The suggestions on Church Organisation brought forward at the Leeds Conference, 1888, are practically an application of his National scheme to a particular section of the Non-Conformist Churches.

I confess it appears to me that, in spite of such efforts as I have enumerated, Martineau's mind did not of itself dwell much upon the Church, abstract or concrete, ideal or real. He was not eager to be comprehended even in that revised and prosaic institution he had drafted as a National establishment. He wanted no better ecclesiastical pedigree, no better official status, than he had. No authority could give him more fellowship with the prophets or saints of the past; and if others thought with something like regret that he was from year to year foregoing the chances of influence and usefulness which a great church might give him, and using powers that were meant for mankind in teaching a few youths in a corner, I am sure his conscience never permitted him to indulge in such reflections. But if the idea of the Church as commonly understood had but little hold upon him, it would be a mistake to suppose that "Christianity without priest and without ritual" was for him a merely personal concern, independent of social relations. True, the centre of gravity is here, as ever with him, on the side of the individual, but to him, as to his friend J. H. Thom, the place of the Church is largely taken by the enhanced value given to the actual worshipping congregation. One is surprised to note, again and again in his writings, the expression of a sense of personal dependence on the voice of the "great congregation" for utterance, when individual faith is dumb; for the higher emotions, when prayer is faint, and aspiration feeble. "The Christian Church has dared to become the organ of the universal secrets of the human soul; to say aloud, with the Amen of multitudes, what private natures were afraid to breathe; to say for ever, in immemorial words, what else no hour would confess in its common speech."

THE NEW MEETING-HOUSE, CALLED "THE OCTAGON CHAPEL."

For something over sixty-six years the Presbyterians in Norwich worshipped in their Meeting-house, and time began to lay his hand upon the building, as upon those who worshipped in it. Many of the older members had passed away, and were buried in the little burial-ground belonging to the chapel; others were laid in the churchyards connected with the parishes in which they lived. The red-brick Meeting-house needed extensive repair, and it was decided at a meeting held on October 3, 1753, that it was advisable to pull down the existing fabric and rebuild on the old site. The Rev. Dr. John Taylor was minister, and Mr. John Taylor, in his MS. History of the Octagon Chapel, says: "The direction and superintendence of the building was chiefly confided to my father and Mr. Samuel Wiggett"—probably a son of the Mr. Wiggett connected with the building of the old Meeting-house. A committee having been formed and a subscription list opened, plans and estimates were asked for. The first designs that were offered were evidently on the rectangular plan of the then existing building and did not meet with approval, for it was at a later meeting resolved "that Mr. Lee (a carpenter and joiner) proceed on drawing an 'octangular' plan and bring it to the committee, together with an elevation, section of the roof, and estimate of same." Mr. Ivory, who also seems to have been a carpenter, at the same time produced a model of a roof on an octangular plan, and Mr. Rawlins, a mason, exhibited a new front elevation for the same.

A feeling seems to have been entertained by certain of the committee that local talent was not equal to the task of planning the new building, for in the minutes of the committee for January 7, 1754, there is an entry that two plans of a parallelogram and two plans and elevations of an octagon, with section of a roof, were received "from Mr. Morris, of London, for which he charges eight guineas." The meeting at which the committee were to receive their report was held on February 20 at the "Popinjay," a very celebrated old Norwich inn, which stood at the S.W. corner of Tombland, at the corner of a street called Rotten Row. Tradition says that it was the custom thus to meet, and, with solemn Presbyterian dignity and in contemplative mood, aided by the smoking of long "churchwardens," to discuss the best interests of the cause.

The result of this meeting was favourable to local genius, for Mr. Ivory exhibited an octagon model which was approved, and it was ordered that the same be put in execution immediately. The names of the master workmen who were employed are given in a statement of moneys expended on the new building.

Mr. Thomas Ivory seems to have acted as architect, Mr. Thomas Hawkes as surveyor. Sixteen tradesmen were directly employed (among them a Paul Colombine, who was an upholsterer, and a Decarle, a mason), and probably the pastor acted as "clerk of the works." Dr. Taylor laid the foundation-stone on February 25, 1754, and the building was opened for worship on May 12, 1756. While the new chapel was being erected the congregation met for worship in the church of St. Mary the Less, in what is now called Queen-street, then used by the Walloon congregation, whose number was very small and slowly dying out. The minister was the Rev. John Bruckner, who had accepted office in 1751 on a salary of £40 a year. This meagre sum he increased by taking pupils in the French language, among whom was in later years Amelia Alderson, afterwards Amelia Opie, niece of one of the ministers of the Octagon Chapel. He also for some years officiated as minister of the Dutch Church.

There is an entry in the minute-books to the effect that "Mr. Sam. Wiggett do pay Mr. Chs. Lee £32 8s. 4d. for work done at the French Church." What this work was we can only surmise. Probably the benches and other fittings were brought from the shortly to be demolished Meeting-house, and the church prepared to receive the greatly augmented congregation. The principal families attending the French Church were the Colombines and Martineaus, and these names and some others were very familiar to the friends who were now for two years to worship with them. As far back as 1694 Isaac, son of Jacob Votier, had been baptized in the Presbyterian meeting-house, while from 1722 to 1752 the names of Peter (2), Mary, Elizabeth, David, Harriett, and Philip Meadows Martineau are also recorded in the list of baptisms, while, during the time the united congregations were worshipping in the French Church, the baptism of a David and a Peter Finch Martineau were registered. Also in 1737 Peter, the son of Peter and Mary Colombine, was baptized in the Presbyterian meeting-house.

There is no record as to the arrangement made between the united congregations in regard to the services to be rendered by their respective pastors, but they were happy in having two men so greatly respected and loved as John Taylor and John Bruckner to minister to their spiritual needs.

The cost of erecting the new chapel was upwards of £5,174, and nearly the whole sum was contributed by the congregation, who were justly proud of their building. Mr. Taylor tells us that the roof is admirable in its contrivance, and that the fluted columns are of the Corinthian order. The eye of the critic, he says, may be offended by the disfigurement of the columns at those parts where the mouldings and cornices of the galleries cut into them; but, as the galleries were not to be dispensed with, beauty was sacrificed to utility. The wainscot of the gallery front, the pews, and other parts of the building were stained to darken the oak and brushed up with best Dutch rushes from a recipe given to Dr. Taylor, probably by Mr. William Lowle, who came specially from London to marble the columns. Mr. Taylor calls him an "eminent artist." There is certainly a wealth of old oak in the building; the stairs themselves are in solid blocks.

In the old building some of the pews had been lined according to the fancy of the occupier, which gave a motley hue to the edifice; hat-pins or pegs had also been put up on the gallery front and walls, which had a bad effect, and these practices were now discontinued. Further, no corpses were to be buried within the walls of the chapel, and all soil dug from the old burial-ground was to be carted away. We are told that large quantities of timber were buried in the foundations or worked into the walls as bonds, and during recent years, while excavating close to the foundations of the chapel, large quantities of branches, twigs, and leaves of willow were found, as also some human bones, marking the site of part of the old burial-ground.

The impression the interior of the new building could make upon a stranger is delightfully told by none other than John Wesley, who visited Norwich at the end of the year 1757, and, in his Journal, says, under date December 23: "I was shown Dr. Taylor's new meeting-house—perhaps the most elegant one in all Europe. It is eight square, built of the finest brick, with sixteen sash-windows below, as many above, and eight skylights in the dome, which, indeed, are purely ornamental. The inside is finished in the highest taste, and is as clean as any nobleman's saloon. The communion-table is fine mahogany; the very latches of the pew doors are polished brass. How can it be thought that the old coarse gospel should find admission here?"

The communion-table is not mahogany, but beech, and of good form and colour. The communion vessels consist of six plates and four cups. The plates are solid silver, and bear an inscription in 18th century Roman type: "The gift of Mr. John Raining, 1713." In the centre of each plate is a large double cypher—I.F.P.C., for John and Frances, Presbyterian Congregation. The maker's mark appears to be that of Seth Lofthouse. Mr. John Raining was a wealthy Dutch merchant who married Frances Mottram, a daughter of John Mottram, one of the trustees of the first meeting-house. The cups, four in number, are silver, gilt inside, with covers and handles, and are very elegant. The date mark is for 1785, in which year they were purchased. There are also two fiddle-shaped alms-boxes in mahogany, of about the same date. Mr. Thomas Smith received £31 10s. "for ye Dial," which does its work as well to-day as it did nearly one hundred and fifty years ago.

Personal comfort was not considered in these heroic times to the extent demanded to-day. The congregation not only walked uprightly, but sat uprightly in their oaken "horse-boxes," as their degenerate sons have lived to call the pews in which their fathers worshipped—and further, to so modify them that physical discomfort does not now necessarily attend upon divine worship.

In external appearance the chapel is very unattractive, which the severely plain classic portico does little to relieve. Eight domed windows pierce the roof and give light to the interior of the dome. Originally the roof had a wrought-iron and gilded copper ball finial, giving an ornamental finish to the apex, but this has now disappeared. The novel shape of the building and the heretical opinions of those who worshipped within its walls afforded an opportunity to the profane to exercise their wit, and for a generation or so the chapel was known as the "Devil's cucumber-frame"—a variation on the more commonplace phrase, "a hot-bed of infidelity."

Dr. John Taylor's sermon at the opening of the new chapel was a remarkable one. His text was from Haggai ii. 8, 9, and the appeal to his congregation was to seek peace with God by a closer following and seeking after the Divine Will; peace with our fellows by seeking after goodness, brotherly kindness, honesty, meekness, and all those things that are lovely and of good report, and this not only in the church, but also in the civic life. "We are Christians," he says, "and only Christians—a name which includes all that is virtuous and amiable, just and good, excellent and heavenly. Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, Arians, Trinitarians, and others are names of religious distinctions. But, however we may commonly be ranked under any of these divisions, we reject them all. Uniformity of sentiments and worship our present state of imperfection will not permit, but love and friendly affections, candour and mutual forbearance are the strong cement which connects Christians into one happy body, sweetly refreshing life and promoting our spiritual growth, opening the understanding and giving freedom of mind to admit the truth wherever we find it.

"This chapel, therefore, we have erected, and here we intend to worship the living and true God, through Jesus Christ, not in opposition to, but in perfect peace and harmony with our fellows. This edifice is founded upon no party principles or tenets, but is built on purpose and with this design, : : : that we may be quite free to search the Scriptures to discover, correct, and reform, at any time, our own mistakes and deficiencies, and at liberty to exercise communion with any of our Christian brethren. Thus shall we act as becomes good Christians, the 'Sons of Peace,' and 'the peace of God, which passeth all understanding,' will rule in our hearts, and the God of Peace will make us perfect in every good work to do His will, through Jesus Christ."

Dr. Taylor must have given a considerable impetus to the intellectual life in Norwich during the twenty-four years of his pastorate, an intellectual life that seemed largely centred in the Octagon for at least two generations. Among many celebrated names may be mentioned those of J. E. Smith, founder of the Linnean Society; R. Woodhouse, Professor of Astronomy at Cambridge; W. Taylor, German scholar; James Martineau, the centenary of whose birth will be celebrated in Norwich on Good Friday next; and his sister Harriet, who as a child watched for the angels to descend through the round windows in the chapel dome and speak to her.

The roll of ministers from Dr. Taylor onward is a long one. Samuel Bourn; Robert Alderson, Amelia Opie's uncle, who resigned his pastorate, was called to the bar, became Recorder of Norwich, and father of Georgina Caroline Alderson, wife of the late Marquis of Salisbury; William Enfield, LL.D.; Pendlebury Houghton, Thomas Madge, Edward Tagart, J. H. Hutton, Alexander Gordon, M.A., are among the many names still held in honour, not to mention some who in recent years have come and gone, leaving cherished memories behind.

It is interesting to note that in 1813 there were three Unitarian congregations in Norwich, Thomas Madge being minister at the Octagon. The Rev. Isaac Perry assistant minister at the Old Meeting (Independent) Chapel, withdrew in 1808, and with him a considerable portion of the congregation, who forthwith formed themselves into a church, appointing Mr. Perry as pastor. For a time they met in the French Church, and subsequently purchased the Cherry Lane Meeting House. Early in 1812 Mr. Perry renounced evangelical doctrine and announced himself Unitarian. This caused some of the members to return to the Old Meeting-house, and in 1814, upon Mr. Perry accepting the pastorate of the St. Nicholas Chapel at Ipswich, the congregation dispersed, many joining the Octagon. For some years Mr. Perry kept a "Classical School" in Pitt-street, where the Cherry Lane Chapel is situated.

During this same period a Rev. H. Winder, General Baptist Minister, was reported to be a Unitarian, his congregation meeting in a building formerly part of the Priory of the Carmelites or Whitefriars, and which was known as Priory Yard Chapel.

As the last quarter of the 17th century saw the building and extension of the first Presbyterian meeting-house, and the middle years of the 18th century saw the building of the present Octagon Chapel, so the first quarter of the 19th century saw the development of the educational movement which was the great and important contribution of the exponents of Liberal religious thought to their civic life during that period. In the early months of the year 1823 the Octagon Chapel Sunday Schools were started, with the help of James Martineau, who had already taken part in Sunday-school and kindred missionary work in York and the neighbourhood. These schools have continued for upwards of eighty years, and at the present time have over three hundred children and young people on the registers. But zeal for the welfare of the young was not confined to Sunday-school teaching. In the year 1695 Joanna Scott left an endowment for the instruction of thirty children of poor and respectable parents in the rudiments of education, and for nearly a century and a half a school for boys and girls was carried on through the thoughtful piety of this early benefactress. In 1836 the number of scholars had so increased that a separate day school for girls was started by members of the Octagon congregation. After some vicissitudes a school building was erected in 1844, and thirteen years later a separate school was built for infants. Later, in 1860, the present Presbyterian boys' day school buildings were erected by old scholars and friends of the Octagon. These schools have always been freely open to the children of parents of all denominations, and have been absolutely unsectarian. A clause in the will of Joanna Scott is still observed, which enjoins that scholars, on finally leaving school, shall on reciting the 23rd Psalm and passages from the fifth chapter of Matthew's Gospel, be given a copy of the Bible. After the passing of the Education Act in 1870 the trustees of the boys' school raised the curriculum to the standard of a secondary school. Unlike the girls' and infants' schools, the boys' school has not been taken over by the new Educational Authority and become a Council School.

The present school buildings were erected on sites belonging to the trustees of a local charity, and, in the case of the girls' and infants' schools, these have recently reverted to the trustees as ground landlords. A few years hence and the like fate will befall the buildings of the boys' school. Then the Sunday schools would be left homeless, as it were, and as a well-equipped Sunday school is absolutely essential to the life of the church, the loss of school accomodation or weakening of its strength would have a disastrous effect on the well-being of the Octagon congregation. The schools have always suffered, as Sunday schools, in being carried on in separate buildings. The Octagon congregation is not a large one, and its working force is weakened by lack of concentration, for Sunday-school teaching, in one building. A further drawback is that the school buildings are some little distance from the chapel. It seems, then, that there is a very clear call to a supreme effort on the part of the church, and that their work in the opening years of the 20th century is to raise a building which shall be a home for the united Sunday schools and an institute where social work can be carried on not only among the young, in connection with the flourishing Guild of Service, but also with men and women of the Octagon congregation and of the larger congregation without its walls. All the churches of Christendom are becoming more alive to the fact that their work in the future must be both religious and social, and it behoves such a free community of religious men and women as worships in the Octagon Chapel to show that they are in the forefront of all social movements that make for the coming of the Kingdom of God. That such a building as is urgently needed should also be a memorial in the city of his birth to James Martineau is most fitting.

The idea has already been partly realised, for, thanks to the generosity of many friends, the site has been purchased. We appeal to an ever-widening circle of friends and sympathisers to help us to entirely realise our ideal. G. A. KING.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belfast.—The Non-Subscribing ministers dined together this week to meet Principal Gordon and Rev. C. Peach in connection with efforts to raise £20,000 for the collegiate residence, &c., of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. The speakers included Revs. W. S. Smith (chairman), W. Napier, R. Lyttle, T. Dunkerley, W. S. Dunbar, and others; and the deputation from the College expressed the warmest gratitude for the help rendered to the fund by Ireland.

Birmingham (Newhall Hill).—On Sunday Rev. W. Copeland Bowie preached morning and evening. In the evening there was a large congregation, both services being most inspiring and helpful. On Monday evening a social gathering of the congregation was held in the schoolroom to celebrate the anniversary of the Rev. Thomas Paxton's settlement. The chairman of the Vestry Committee, Mr. A. Derrington, was in the chair. The Rev. Joseph Wood, of the Old Meeting Church, was present, and gave a very encouraging address.

Bootle.—On March 29 and 30 a sale of work was successfully held. Mr. Pidgeon presided at the opening ceremony, which was performed by Mr. A. S. Thew (chairman of the Liverpool District Missionary Association). Representatives from our local congregations were present, and thanks to kind support, the sum of nearly £90 was realised, which will serve to clear off a deficit of £60, and to provide for church renovation.

Brighton.—The Rev. Priestly Prime, the recently appointed minister here, began on Sunday a course of four Sunday evening sermons on "The Philosophy and Religion of James Martineau," in connection with the centenary.

Bristol: Lewins Mead Chapel.—An interesting service was held on Sunday afternoon in recognition of the association of thirteen of the elder scholars from the Sunday-schools with the Lewins Mead Congregation. For some years past religious services with the same object have been held in the schoolroom; but on this occasion it was thought advisable that the gathering should take place in the chapel itself. The service was conducted by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., and there were present, in addition to the teachers and scholars with their superintendents, Mr. W. Alfred T. Price and Miss Price, of the Boys' and Girls' School respectively; the treasurer of the congregation, Mr. A. H. R. Pope; the members of the Congregational Committee, and several friends from the congregation. After the devotional service the scholars were addressed by their ministers. They were reminded, as they identified themselves with Lewins Mead, of the responsiblities they took upon themselves; of their obligation to earnest and reproachless life, and of their right to all the help and advice which their religious home could afford them. They were bidden to reverence the memories of faithful and devout lives that consecrated that house of prayer; and very impressive was the promise of the young friends to endeavour to live worthily of the spiritual inheritance into which they that day solemnly entered. At the conclusion of the address a kind and appropriate welcome was offered on behalf of the congregation by Mr. Charles Bromhead, who handed to each of the young people a copy of the hymn and chant book used in the Sunday services at Lewins Mead, which was the gift of the Congregational Committee, Burnley.—Anniversary services were conducted at Burnley-lane Unitarian Mission on Sunday; in the morning the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, Rev. J. E. Jenkins, and Mr. Thomas Graham being the preachers. Good congregations assembled on each occasion. In the evening Mr. James Crabtree, of Todmorden, unveiled portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Sutcliffe, two of the pioneers of the Unitarian movement in Burnley-lane, and staunch supporters of the cause up to their decease, which occurred recently within a few months of each other. Mr. Peter J. Hargreaves, Mr. J. S. Mackie, and Mr. Jabez Smith also spoke.

Coseley.—The Rev. H. Eachus, who has completed forty years' ministry, was presented on April 1 with a purse of gold and an address.

Dover.—On March 28, a farewell meeting was held on the occasion of the Rev. S. Burrows leaving his pastorate here, which has extended over twelve years. Mr. G. Chitty, who presided, read a letter to Mr. Burrows on behalf of the church, expressing cordial goodwill. Mr. Burrows will reside at Hastings for the present.

Exeter.—Very successful entertainments by the Sunday-school scholars were given on March 29 and on April 5, when two short plays were presented, one of them having been written and arranged by Miss Biss, the Lady Superintendent of the Sunday-school. Various articles made by the members of the Young People's Working Party during the winter session were offered for sale. There was a good attendance at each performance.

Gloucester.—Two interesting events were commemorated on Friday evening, April 7, the 206th anniversary of the erection of the chapel, and the fifteenth anniversary of the ministry of the Rev. Walter Lloyd in Gloucester. The proceedings commenced with tea in the schoolroom, after which a meeting was held in the chapel, when addresses appropriate to the occasion were delivered by Dr. F. T. Bond, who presided, the Rev. W. Lloyd, Mr. Charles Washbourne, and Mr. A. H. Keeping. The meeting was followed by a concert. On Monday, March 27, the Rev. Walter Lloyd delivered a lecture on "The Siege of Gloucester" to the members of the Gloucester Certificated Teachers' Asssociation at the British Schools. The president (Mr. A. Dix) was in the chair. The lecture was much appreciated.

Godalming. — On March 29 the annual concert of the Meadrow String Band was held at Meadrow Chapel. There was a large audience and an excellent programme. A supper followed in the schoolroom. The Mayor (Dr. H. M. Leathes) spoke of the high qualities of the band, to which the Rev. E. S. Lang-Buckland also testified. Mr. J. H. Mather expressed the gratitude of all to the Rev. Hubert Clarke for his untiring service in the support of this admirable service of culture in the town.

Halifax.—A three days' Daffodil Bazaar was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday, April 5, 6, and 8, to raise money to clear off the debts of both chapel and school incurred by the installation of the el ctric light in the school, and other improvements. The receipts were £215.

Halstead.—Mr. V. H. Sukhtankar, Brahmo Samaj, has delivered a very instructive address here on "Unitarianism and the Brahmo Samaj." About 70 adults were present, including several from other denominations in the town.

Hinckley.—On Wednesday, April 5, a recognition meeting was held to welcome the recently appointed minister, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, and Mrs. Jenkins. After tea a public meeting took place, Mr. John Atkins, J.P., presided, supported by the Rev. G. von Petzold, M.A., Leicester; Miss Gittins, and Miss E. Gittins, Leicester; Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A., Bolton; Rev. Evan Jenkins, Llwynrhydowen, and other speakers. Much regret was expressed at the absence, through illness, of Rev. E. W. Lummis, Leicester. The meeting, very fully attended, was of the most cheerful and enthusiastic character, leaving a clear impression that Mr. Jenkins has commenced his ministry in Hinckley under the happiest auspices.

Kidderminster. — On April 5 a welcome meeting, preceded by tea, was given to the Rev. J. E. Stronge, who began his ministry here on Sunday. There was an attendance of nearly 600 in the Town Hall, where addresses were given by the chairman (Mr. W. H. Talbot), Mr. Joseph Highfield (Sunday-school), Miss C. Badland (choir), Mr. F. Arnold (Young People), Revs. Jos. Wood, J. W. Austin, J. C. Street, A. H. Thomas. and W. G. Tarrant. Several Evangelical Free Church ministers were present, of whom the Revs. E. D. Braimbridge and A. Gibson spoke in cordial welcome. Mr. Stronge, in replying, asked for the support of all in the great work, religious and social, which they had before them. He took the many kind expressions used by the speakers as an indication that such help would be generously given. A concert followed, and the proceedings were throughout of a most enjoyable character.

Leicester: Great Meeting.—At the conclusion of the morning service on Sunday, the chairman of the vestry, Mr. A. H. Paget, made an announcement as to the arrangements for filling the pulpit during the three months' leave of absence granted to the pastor, the Rev. E. W. Lummis, in order that he may recruit his health. It was stated that the rev. gentleman had gone to Lynton, Devon, where he intended making a prolonged stay. A resolution was passed approving the steps taken by the vestry, and expressing sympathy with Mr. Lummis, and the sincere hope of the congregation that the rest and change may have the effect of restoring him to health.

Leigh (Lancashire).—School anniversary services were held on April 2. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Sheffield, and late pastor of the Leigh Church, was the preacher. There were good congregations, and the collections were the largest yet taken at similar services at Leigh.

London: Mansford-street.—On March 30 the sixteenth annual meeting was held at Rosslyn Hill, the Rev. F. K. Freeston in the chair. The report of the Church and Mission, under the Rev. Gordon Cooper, was most cheering. A striking feature in the year's life has been the formation, on lines tentatively began by the Rev. J. Ellis, in two previous winters, of a Working Men's Club, which now includes 80 members. The success of this beneficial work, which is carried on every evening, necessitates an extension of the premises, which were already in full use with clubs, classes, and other meetings. The estimate for the new buildings and contingent work is £750, and a very encouraging first list of donations having been made, the work is already in hand, and an earnest appeal is made for the balance of £300, or so, still required. Resolutions were passed as advertised in another column; and we have the utmost confidence in commending the appeal to the generous notice of our readers. The work here is amongst the best done by our friends in the Metropolis. Contributions may be sent to Miss L. Jones (treasurer), Riverton, Hadley Wood, Barnet; Mr. S. W. Preston, 7, Eldon-road, Hampstead; or Mr. J. C. Drummond, 12, Worsley-road, Hampstead.

London: Peckham.—The annual meeting of the Avondale Band of Hope was held on April 4. Mr. J. Bredall, president of the society, gave an interesting address, and the minister on supply, Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, distributed the prizes to the members.

London: Stratford.—The second of the series of Services for the People was held in the Town Hall, Stratford, on Sunday last. The evening was exceedingly wet, and in consequence the attendance fell to a little over 300. The eloquent address given by the Rev. James C. Street, on "Man, the Creator of his own Heaven and Hell," which lasted over an hour, was listened to throughout with the greatest attention. The collection amounted to £2 11s. 6d. With brighter weather it is hoped that the attendance may again be a large one next Sunday, when the Rev. John Page Hopps will take for his subject "Hold on by God." In referring, last week, to the Churches in the East of London who are helping in this movement, omission was made of Walthamstow, whose members, under the direction of the Rev. W. H. Rose, have been working zealously towards the success of the meetings.

London Sunday School Society.—At the Musical Festival held on Saturday last the following schools competed for the banner:—Brixton, Islington, Highgate, Kensington, Limehouse, George's Row, and Stratford. The banner was awarded to Brixton, George's Row being second, and Highgate third. Mr. Docker adjudicated. In the evening a concert was given.

Malton.—The lantern services and lectures were concluded last Sunday. The Chapel has on each occasion been well filled. The slides illustrating "The Story of Religion in England" and "Travel and Life in Palestine," have been much admired.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—On March 31 the 69th annual meeting was held, Mr. R. Wade presiding. Mr. A. E. Steinthal presented the report, which showed a satisfactory state of things. There are 768 scholars on the Sunday-school books, and 52 teachers; the evening classes number (winter) 2,527 students. The total expenditure was £1,223. The report was adopted on the motion of the chairman, seconded by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith. Colonel Pilcher moved, and Mr. G. Raynor Wood seconded a vote of thanks to the superintendents and teachers.

Manchester: Moss Side.—On April 1, a sale of work was held in the school, on behalf of the New Organ Fund. At the opening ceremony, the chair was taken by Mr. H. M. Whitefield, and the sale declared open by Colonel Pilcher. This effort, which wes organised by the Ladies' Sewing Society, proved a great success, the proceeds amounting to over £100.

Manchester (Oldham-road).—On April 9 the annual choir festival took place. The principal vocalists were Madame Evelyn Archer and Mr. Webster Millar, and the choir sang several anthems. Mr. Jenkins, of Oldham, gave an appropriate address. The service, under Mr. Sydney Higham's direction as choirmaster, was very bright and helpful.

Plymouth and Devonport.—On March 29 a welcome was given to the new minister of these congregations, the Rev. J. H. Belcher. Mr. E. B. Micklewood, who presided; Mr. Bryan, Mr. J. Paton, and Mr. J. G. Norman, gave addresses of welcome. In replying, Mr. Belcher thanked the members of the two churches for their cordial reception of his wife and himself. There were just two things he would like to say as to his position. First, Unitarianism, as he understood it, was not the acceptance of a creed from which some few items of the accepted beliefs had been deleted. It was rather an attitude of mind, an eagerness to learn, a patience to inquire, and a courage to surrender any doctrine formerly held as soon as it appeared baseless. Thus Unitarianism was not fixed, but moved with the movement of men's thoughts, and concerned itself with the very latest knowledge won by savants. The modern thinker, though an Agnostic, should find in Unitarianism that devout, rational spirit which Professor Huxley desiderated. The second point, as important as the first, Mr. Belcher continued, was the practical Gospel which he had to declare. It was that enthusiasm of humanity which all great teachers had expounded—an enthusiasm which modern thinking was at length weaving into economic and sociological theories, and of which modern democratic and economic apparatus was rapidly becoming the practical channel.

Pontypridd.—Our thirteenth anniversary services were held April 2. Dr. Griffiths, of Ilkeston, preached. The services were well attended, and in the evening the hall was crowded.

Stockport.—On April 2, the Rev. B. C. Constable completed a series of five Sunday evening discourses on "A Reasonable Religion towards which all Modern Thought is tending." The attendance was much above the average. Each discourse was fully reported, and by request the last ("Reasonable and Wide Spreading Views of Life and Duty") will be printed and widely distributed.

Torquay.—The spring session of lectures and concerts was brought to a conclusion on Monday week, when a well-attended concert was given. The series included two concerts and four lectures.

Ulster Unitarian Christian Association.—The annual meeting was held at Belfast, on Monday, Mr. J. Davidson, presiding. There was a large attendance, and some excellent addresses. We must defer a fuller report till next week.

York.—On the 4th inst. the annual social meeting was held. The chairman (Mr. E. F. Lewin) said that whilst the financial position was good, every effort should be made to keep up the present standard. Notwithstanding the fact that no resident minister had yet been appointed, good progress had been made during the past year, a very pleasing feature being the material increase in new members.

To Correspondents.—Letters, &c., received from J. H. C., J. M. C., J. D. E., D. McE., J. C. G., E. H., J. L. H., C. W. J., F. G. J., H. M. J., J. H. R., A. T., F. W., W. G. W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EASTER brings for us this year the commemoration also of the centenary of the birth, on April 21, of James Martineau. We hope next week to publish a full report of the centenary meetings at Norwich, and orders for extra copies of next week's INQUIRER should be sent in at once. Of the Oxford celebration on May 1 and 2 an announcement will be found advertised in another column.

WE are very glad to learn that in commemoration of the centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth, the well known and striking portrait, painted by Mr. A. E. Emslie in 1888, is to find its permanent home at Essex Hall. Three of the Trustees—Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe—have the task in hand of raising a fund for the purchase of the picture; and it is hoped to complete the purchase within the next few days. At Essex Hall the portrait will be seen by a large number of visitors from all parts of the country, and from foreign lands.

WITH reference to Mr. King's interesting article in last week's INQUIRER on the Octagon Chapel at Norwich, a correspondent points out that, if it was early in 1823 that the Sunday-school was established, Martineau's part in it cannot have been due to any experience of school or missionary work at Manchester College, since he only went to York in 1822, and during their first years the students were not allowed to undertake such work. This correction our correspondent makes on the authority of a letter which he received from Dr. Martineau himself in 1895. Mr. King sends us also the following erratum: On p. 240, third column, line 19, for "father" read "grandfather."

SOMETHING like consternation has been produced this week by the report presented to the London County Council on Tuesday, with respect to the metropolitan schools hitherto known as "voluntary." The report shows that, in the judgment of the experts who have had to inspect the buildings, and who have been guided by the standards applied under Government sanction to the Council (formerly Board) schools, the majority are defective, some deplorably so. The arrangements of some are so insanitary and unsafe that it is recommended that they be closed at once. The children's health, and indeed, their life, in case of fire, is exposed to serious and wholly preventable risk; while from the educational point of view, many of these schools are as strongly condemned as from the structural. If the Council does its duty by the children, fresh places will have to be provided for tens of thousands of them, needless to say at a great cost to the ratepayers.

Now, it is quite open to defenders of these ill-equipped schools to minimise their defects, and for our part we trust the practical wisdom of the Council will not allow any waste of money or material where a reasonable and really tolerable provision can be made for carrying on school work, even if the highest ideals have in some cases to be postponed. But it cannot be imagined for a moment that the inspectors have so exaggerated the deficiencies of the system which they condemn that there is no serious change necessary. In fact, all who have had actual contact with these mis-called "voluntary" schools know that instead of being a respectable rival to the really public schools, they have been a poverty-stricken and pretentious parasite on the public purse. The amount of the "voluntary" support given to them was, indeed, just enough to furnish an excuse, but not to justify the claim, for independent private management. This exposure shows how egregiously unfair has been the treatment given respectively to the two sets of schools. School Boards have been worried by the department; "voluntary" managers have been allowed to slip on neglecting their duty. This that we see, and must pay for, is the upshot.

THERE has just come to hand the Official Report of the Thirteenth Universal Peace Congress, held at Boston in October last. The contents call for more than a note, but here is an apposite quotation from the address of the Rev. Charles F. Dole (one of the many Unitarian ministers, we are glad to say, who took warm interest in the Congress). Mr. Dole presided at a meeting to consider "The mutual relations of races, and the menace to the world's order through the exploitation of weaker peoples," and in his opening address he said:—"Shall we believe what we say we believe about the democracy of man? Shall we believe that men are our brothers, whatever the colour of their skins may be? That is the precise question before the world. There are multitudes who tell us that they do not believe it at all. They tell us the only way we can manage for the weaker and infirm people, as they call them, is for the stronger people (that is we) to take them in hand. And they say, pointing to superficial results—precisely as in the old days people pointed to the picturesque results on a great Virginian plantation—they say, 'See how beneficent in India and in Java this kind of rule is.' And at the same time things are going on all over the world that make one's heart sick."

THE preparatory work for the proposed union of three of the Methodist bodies is still going on satisfactorily. A joint committee of the Methodist New Connexion, the Methodist Free Church, and the Bible Christians met recently, and thoroughly discussed the various questions that will need settlement, and organisations that will need to be assimilated, and financial problems that will have to be solved before the actual union takes place. It is believed by those best able to judge that there will be enthusiasm enough, patience enough, faith and charity enough, as they are demanded, to carry the scheme through. The proposals of the joint committee will, as a matter of course, have to be discussed at the Conferences of the three denominations concerned. A great deal of work and waiting must necessarily take place before views can be duly adjusted, or mutual concessions arranged, but it is confidently believed that the day is steadily drawing nigh when the Doxology will be sung in thankfulness that the three are made one.

"RESURRECTION" is the title of the April number of Sermons for the Day, being an Easter sermon preached by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong in 1901.

ON THE WINGS OF DELIGHT.—III.

HILL-TOWNS IN TUSCANY.

After Venice and Florence there came for us some most delightful days of driving through the country, days not of unbroken weather, but none the less beautiful on that account. Eastward from Florence to Vallombrosa, and next day over the Consuma Pass to Bibbiena, then south by Arezzo to Cortona, and westward a long day's drive to Siena, such was the course of the first four days, happily continued for the rest of the party further northward, but for the writer of these notes ending there, and followed by a swift journey home.

It was on Monday, April 10, after a quiet morning at Fiesole, that we started. Florence lay below, bathed in glorious sunshine, but our road did not take us into the city again. We made our way down to the eastward into the valley of the Arno, following its course through Pontassieve to Sant' Ellero; and then, on the second day, after crossing the hills, finding it again in an upper reach at Bibbiena. Including half an hour's break at Pontassieve for coffee and a good dusting of the hapless occupants of the second carriage, (since their horses had insisted for a good part of the way on keeping close behind the others, and the heat and dust had been rather tremendous), the drive to Sant' Ellero took three hours; and there the climb up to Vallombrosa began, lasting rather more than two hours, with plenty of walking for the men. There is a rack-and-pinion railway that goes up to Saltino, but with a hardy little horse added to each of our pairs and a merry little Italian lad to look after the leader, the carriages took the mountain road without any trouble. As we rose higher and higher, the sense of exhilaration grew. The splendid air, the flowers on the road-side, the great spaces of the hills, with distant views across the deep valley by which we climbed part of the way, were most refreshing after the dust of the lower road. We passed through more than one little village, not touching Saltino, but going by way of Tosi, and soon, at a height of some 3,000 ft., were buried in the glorious woods of Vallombrosa. There were glades of beech and chestnut, as yet bare of leaves, but for the most part on our road splendid pines; and, as we approached the little group of buildings about the old monastery, nestling in a hollow of the hill-side, we saw the grass brilliant with wild crocus. We were early visitors, but when the trees are all fully out, at that great height, Vallombrosa must be a delicious refuge from the heat of the plains below.

The monastery was founded in 1015, by Giovanni Gualberto, of Florence, he who forgave his enemy one Good Friday morning, when he met and might have killed him in the narrow defile leading up to San Miniato. (Has not Burne-Jones pictured him, as the figure of the Christ stooped from the crucifix and kissed his faithful knight?) Gualberto entered the monastery of San Miniato, but, finding the discipline too lax, retired to the mountain solitude and so became the founder of Vallombrosa.

Another memory was with us there as we crossed the bed of one mountain stream after another, and last year's leaves were lying thick among the stones. None of us at the moment could remember Milton's lines exactly, but we found them afterwards in Hare:—

"Thick as autumnal leaves, that strow the brooks
"In Vallombrosa, where the Etrurian shades
"High over-arched embower."

The present buildings of the monastery, which since its dissolution in 1866 has become the home of a school of forestry, date from the year 1637, and must have been quite new when Milton came up there after his visit to the aged Galileo at Florence.

It was half-past five when we reached the monastery and its neighbour, our Albergo della Foresta, and, though it seemed only a little higher up into the snow, there was only time before dusk and dinner to reach one short stage more, the terrace of the dépendance Paradisino (3,960 ft.), from which there is a splendid view, over the woods and down the valley of the Arno, where, when it is clear, part of the dome of the Cathedral at Florence can be seen over a distant hill, in a direct line about 16 miles away. That evening it was not clear enough, and we hoped for the morning. But, unfortunately for eager spirits of the early dawn, the rain came down, and so we started on our second day's drive with a closed carriage and the curtains of the covered wagonette partly drawn. Ours were the first carriages to make their way by the new direct route from Vallombrosa on to the Consuma Pass, which is in fact not yet quite completed.

As we drove along the steep hillside, through the beautiful woods, the valley far below was already in sunshine, and soon we also were out of the rain. It returned more than once during the day, but could not spoil our pleasure, and the evening at Bibbiena was beautiful. Before we reached Consuma, just over the pass, the carriages had bumped over a very rough bit of the unfinished road, and then had a long sweep round before they could crest the hill. Meanwhile the men walked by a shorter way across the head of another gully in the hillside, and there sheltered under a perfect canopy of pine from the rain, which had returned, till the carriages arrived.

Bibbiena was the first of the hill towns in which we stayed, though we passed close under the steep hill on which Poppi is perched. These are romantic little towns, seen from afar in their walled security, with fine towers of church or castle, and to be entered only through the old gateways. It was astonishing how the horses clattered up the steep paved streets with hardly room to pass, and safely turned impossible corners till an old inn was found somewhere hidden away in the labyrinth. At Bibbiena we looked straight across to the high hill on which La Verna stands, the famous monastery first built by Francis of Assisi in 1215, at a height greater even than that of Vallombrosa. It was very tempting, being so near, to make the pilgrimage which every true Franciscan must delight to make, but our road lay southward through the Casentino, the valley of the upper Arno, to Arezzo.

There, on Wednesday, April 12, we spent more than two hours in the fascinating old town set high on its hill, with noble churches and the memory of Petrarch, whose native place it was. But even more striking was Cortona, where we slept that night. By five o'clock we were at the foot of the hill on which it stands, but it took the carriages hardly less than an hour to climb up by the long winding road into the town, though on foot, by a much steeper climb, it was possible to reach the terrace from which the cathedral looks down upon the plain, in about half that time.

Cortona has enormous walls, partly built of the huge blocks of stone belonging to the Etruscan period, and from the highest point of the city, on which an old fortress and the church of Santa Margherita stand, one can look down on a splendid sweep of wall descending steeply to one of the old gates, and then, on a lower level still, circling the cathedral and other of the public buildings, while far below one looks over the broad plain. On the other side of the town, about ten miles away, Lake Trasimene is seen, where Hannibal inflicted so disastrous a defeat on the Roman army. Far across the plain, towards sunset, there are distant hills, while close at hand are the higher slopes of the chain, on a spur of which (itself over 2,000 ft. high) Cortona stands—Cortona, one of the ancient twelve federated cities of Etruria.

Next day we had a long sunny drive, across the plain, over a low range of hills, where by the road side we picked abundance of wild cyclamen and some wonderfully sweet flowering heather, which the bees liked as well as we—first, to Rapolano, the quaintest little hill-town, where the priest was preparing to bless the oxen and all the implements of daily work—and then, towards evening, over the curiously barren tract that lies to the east of Siena, into that famous and fascinating city.

But here these notes must come to an abrupt end. Of the cathedral, of the house of Catherine of Siena, of the Palazzo Publico, with its exquisite tower, higher than Giotto's campanile or the tower of the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence, from which again we had a glorious view, nothing can be said. And many other things must be passed over, which it would have been pleasant to relate, of the minor pleasures and humours of this memorable holiday, of the prowess of one who drove, of what our artist achieved, of what the Professor discoursed concerning the thirteenth century, of astonishing excursions into the Italian language. Gladly, also, would we have sung the praises of Theurer, best of couriers! None of these will be forgotten. Nor shall we ever cease to remember with delight, and with a gratitude of which no word is permitted to be spoken, what these weeks in Italy have been to us, how great the gift, for the enrichment of all that is best in life, given with such abundant generosity, and a grace so beautiful, in the simplicity of loving-kindness.

In England, "now that April's here."

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

THE active life of James Martineau was unusually prolonged, and covered one of the most remarkable periods in our history, the Victorian age. When he lay in his cradle Arnold and Carlyle were boys of ten; John Henry Newman was four. F. D. Maurice and F. W. Newman were born in the same year. Then came John Stuart Mill in 1806; Gladstone, Tennyson, and Darwin followed in 1809. It was among these men and their successors that he took his place as "first among living English thinkers," to use Gladstone's phrase; and in their work for religion and philosophy, for politics and science, he became interested with the whole force of his nature. He lived, indeed, the life of a teacher and student; but he never severed himself from the world around. He began life politically as an ardent and enthusiastic young Whig, who found his hero in Lord John Russell; he ended in distrust of democracy, and a vigorous ethical imperialism. He was one of the few who attended both the Coronation and the first Jubilee, in West minster Abbey. He joined the deputation of English Presbyterian ministers who offered their congratulations on the Queen's accession; he drafted the Address which the same body presented on the Diamond Jubilee of 1897. Alongside of the "impressive development of responsible citizenship at home," it emphasised the "expansion of the national life abroad," and defined the problem of the future as the "consolidation of a Constitutional Empire."

During this long period, as everyone knows, a multitude of new intellectual forces entered the field of thought, and operated powerfully on philosophy and religion. In June, 1832, soon after Martineau settled in Liverpool, Jeremy Bentham died; Goethe had passed away three months before; Scott was to tread the same path three months later. The very next year, John Henry Newman would begin Tracts for the Times; Carlyle would utter the poignant cries of Teufelsdröckh; Tennyson and Browning would lead the way on new paths of poetry; Strauss, after leaving Berlin on the death of Hegel, would be at work on the Leben Jesu. English theology was stagnant, under the numbing influences of an Evangelicalism that had lost its first fervour, and been deprived of its great personalities; The Established Church seemed tottering; the neglect of its services, the scandals of pluralism, the dulness of its preaching, exposed it to attacks which seemed to threaten its connection with the State. Meanwhile geology was beginning to threaten the fabric of dogma based on the infallibility of the Bible; while the empirical psychology of Hartley—the pious guide of enlightened Unitarians by his Rule of Life—was converted in the hands of James Mill into a solvent of all religious ideas, the conception of God being as much a product of arbitrary association, and as destitute of reality, as that of a Centaur. It was in this medley of influences, amid the hopes which belonged to the Reform era, and the fears roused by the first timid steps of Biblical criticism and the audacities of radical philosophy, that Martineau began his work. Nothing need here be said of the part which he played in denominational matters (already described in last week's issue by Professor Odgers): I confine myself to some brief and obvious notes on the relation of his thought, his character, and his environment.

The Unitarianism of Martineau's youth followed the tradition of Locke and Hartley in philosophy, and regarded the New Testament as the final authority of Christian doctrine. There was the record of Revelation; and whatever could be proved out of its pages as the meaning of Jesus, must be regarded as "communicated truth," bearing the sanction of the Father of all. In this respect the teaching of Manchester College, York, was in accordance with the language of the venerated fathers of an elder day like Lindsey and Belsham. To this Martineau was himself faithful during his Dublin years. But his continuous study of the New Testament compelled him to face difficulties which the interpretations in his college note-books could no longer satisfy. The first shock apparently arose from the passages in the Synoptic Gospels which were understood to predict the return of Jesus in the lifetime of his hearers, and the establishment of a kingdom in which the Apostles would be associated with him in judgment. In the lectures of 1835 (published under the title of The Rationale of Religious Inquiry, 1836) he first definitely abandoned the hereditary faith, and declared that "no seeming inspiration can establish anything contrary to reason, that the last appeal in all researches into religious truth, must be to the judgments of the human mind; that against these judgments Scripture cannot have any authority, for upon its authority they themselves decide." To work out this principle was to be one of the main occupations of his life. It lay beneath his preaching; it guided his expositions in the classes for the instruction of the young, which he conducted at Liverpool with so much laborious diligence for five-and-twenty years; it found full expression in the group of "Westminster articles" (1851-1853), which dealt with the origins of Christianity; it gave point to the sermon, "One Gospel in many Dialects," in which, at the centenary of the Octagon Chapel at Norwich (1856), he described the different types of Christological conception in the New Testament, justified the divisions of Christendom, and even declared that we should cease to wish for them to disappear. It was not surprising that those who were still unmoved in the ancient faith regarded him with suspicion and alarm.

Those apprehensions have been long since hushed; and Dr. Martineau lived to see them converted into a general reverence, which not even the boldness of his critical onslaught on traditional interpretations could impair. After the publication of The Seat of Authority in Religion, in the spring of 1890, a discussion arose over some of its positions at a dinner at Mansfield College, Oxford, one day in the summer term. It was closed by the weighty utterance of a very eminent theologian of the Free Kirk of Scotland. "The whole book comes to this, that the foundations of religion are in the reason, and the conscience, and the heart of man; and that proposition" added the speaker emphatically, "no one can gainsay." Five years later, in reviewing the labours that had covered two generations, the veteran teacher could sum up the whole by saying, "The substitution in short of religion at first-hand, straight out of the immediate interaction between the Soul and God, for religion at second hand, fetched by copying out of anonymous traditions of the Eastern Mediterranean eighteen centuries ago, has been the really directing, though hardly conscious, aim of my responsible years of life."*

In this "substitution" of one religious basis for another, philosophy came to the rescue, and built up afresh the edifice of faith which Biblical criticism threatened to undermine. Slow indeed was the process, compared with the rapidity of his change of front on the true grounds of congregational union and doctrinal liberty, after the first judgment in the Hewley suit, December, 1833. He was at that time still an ardent admirer of Belsham, and was unshaken in his reverence for Priestley. But his lectures to his classes on moral philosophy brought him face to face with the ingenuous difficulties of young minds; he was already an earnest student of Plato, and began to appeal in his sermons to the "fair and good"; Wordsworth and Coleridge had long been his favourite poets, and he was realising the meaning of Channing's bold stand on the identity of essential moral nature between man and God. Under the quasi-materialistic pantheism in which he was brought up, he had been taught to live at a persistently high moral tension, disguised beneath a veil of necessarianism, but none the less active and vital. The constant practice of self-control might be hidden in the presence of the all-holy God as sole cause; but with that august image always before the inner eye, nothing slovenly or impure could be endured; and when all wishes, impulses, and desires were his, the command of self became still more strenuous, though unacknowledged, for the temple of the Spirit must be kept swept and garnished. Of this he was now to see the meaning. Over against the evangelical scheme of a fallen and ruined nature, and the empirical denial by James Mill of anything more in the self than a succession of states of consciousness, rose a new conception, that of a soul capable of knowing right and wrong, and making choice between them, owning the authority of righteousness, and through it rising into spiritual fellowship with God Himself.

This was the note that began to be heard in his preaching in the years that followed the publication of the Rationale. With this faith he girded himself against the doctrine of Vicarious Atonement in the controversy of 1839; and on this foundation he wrote the sermons which slowly made their way into the heart of the best religious teaching of their time. Of the literary characteristics of these famous discourses, their wonderful imagery, their lyric poignancy of utterance, their intensity of emotional expression, there is no need to speak. Rightly were they named "Endeavours after the Christian Life": the call to strenuousness, the summons to effort and aspiration, was never urged with more insistent appeal. In the stress laid on the sovereignty of duty and the lordship of self-rule, there was a kind of Christian Stoicism. The dignity of the life of lofty aim had no more fervent exponent. Practical wisdom, penetrating insight into the shifts and evasions of the conscience, a tender and supporting sympathy, were assuredly not wanting. Nor did the preacher fail to sound the deeps of that intimate relation of the soul and God which belongs to the religion of the Spirit, and was emphasised with such force and beauty as the last of the "Three Stages of Unitarian Theology" (1869). How far he gave this a place in his formal philosophy is not perhaps quite clear. But it is the constant theme of his delineations of the inner life; it provides the clue to his love of good hymns, of which he never tired; it is the secret of his interpretation of Christianity; it was by this that he was retained in constant homage to Jesus, in whom he saw its loftiest realisation; this was the source of his sympathy with the Athanasian rather than with the Arian type of doctrine in the great controversy of the fourth century: and this drew him to Maurice, among his contemporaries, as the prophet who had borne the noblest witness, for fifteen hundred years, "to the divine root and ground of our humanity."

Of these two elements, the ethical and the spiritual, it was the former which more obviously shaped and guided his activities; it was the latter which sustained their untiring flow, and bound them into a rich and noble harmony. Tendre à la perfection, sans jamais y prétendre, might have been his motto, had he been sufficiently self-conscious to formulate his aim. The first consequence of this never-wearied aspiration was an incessant industry, which could be content with nothing but the most finished work. His mind was of the architectonic order; he loved system and cohesion; and for this he needed mastery over detail. But he knew that successful construction could only be secured by absolute command, both of principles and their application; and to these he willingly gave the necessary time and thought, whether the purpose were the drainage of a house, the management of a garden, the ventilation of a church, the study of a gospel, or the vindication of Theism and the moral government of the world. This was the reason of the long delay in the publication of his two great philosophical treatises; everything must be completed to the last. Similar thoroughness he demanded from others. Slovenly thinking and flabby sentiment, such as he found in much of the philanthropy of his old age, he could not endure, except in the very young, who were not old enough to know better. Once sure of his principles, he followed them with a magnificent courage. No unpopularity could daunt him; no obstacles shake his purpose. His efforts might be frustrated by a perverse generation, but his convictions remained unchanged, and he would repeat his testimony whenever occasion offered. He could not always conceal a pained surprise at the obtuseness of others when all to him was clear: and he had little of the tact which enables a leader to conciliate opposition by sympathetic comprehension of the British genius for compromise. But leadership, though it came to him again and again, was rather forced upon him than sought by him. He was too simple for ambition: he never asked whether his field of action was small or large; he only strove to fulfil the service of the day and hour with his utmost strength. The scene of immediate duty was for him a providential appointment. He did not go abroad seeking wider opportunities: he was content to find a place prepared for him, and fill it.

Sensitive of spirit, he was wounded in earlier days by undeserved mistrust; but when this was converted during his later years into wide-spread reverence, he received it with an exquisite simplicity and lowliness. He enjoyed the broad range of friendships which gave him the sympathy of Jowett and Stanley, Tennyson and Browning, until he became, as he pathetically said, the oldest person of his acquaintance. He was always a learner to the last; and he often learned most from those who seemed doctrinally or ecclesiastically the most remote from him. Among the theologians of the nineteenth century John Henry Newman doubtless exerted a more potent influence upon his time; but if those prophets are right who believe that the real future of religion lies with the ideas of freedom and progress rather than with the principle of authority, it is in Martineau that these ideas will find their English representative in the Victorian age; yet it was Newman whom Martineau named (1870) as "of all living religious writers the man I perhaps love and honour most." Such a teacher was rightly recognised as belonging to the catholic communion of Christendom. A Unitarian by education, he remained a Unitarian by conviction to his latest hour. But souls are of no sect; and he has passed where all are one within the Father's love.

DR. MARTINEAU AND JOHN JAMES TAYLER.

Readers of Dr. Martineau's biography could not fail to be impressed by the affection and reverence which characterised his feelings towards his colleague, the Rev. John James Tayler. A certain reserve which usually characterised Dr. Martineau outside the domestic circle seemed entirely to disappear in his relation with Mr. Tayler, whose death left a poignant sense of loss, almost of loneliness, which was the measure of the intimacy of the friendship which had united the two colleagues. It was, like so many other friendships, based on diversity of gifts and talents, a diversity which made the two teachers singularly qualified to supplement and support each other; and many an old student of Manchester New College couples in his grateful memory the names of Tayler and Martineau. Mr. Tayler never attained the commanding position in the world of thought which fell to his more brilliant colleague, and none would think of attributing to him a striking originality of genius which his sensitive modesty would have instantly and decisively repudiated. But he was a living repository of the best academic traditions, and on that uncertain borderland that lies between the higher range of literary gossip and the firm ground of literary and scholastic history he was delightfully at home and delightfully communicative. Many have been the clues and references in our after reading which the recollection of the overflow of reminiscences which would often interrupt and adorn his lectures has enabled us to follow up with something of the vividness of a personal interest.

Dr. Martineau, indeed, delighted to relieve his philosophical expositions with biographical material, revelled in anecdote, and would sometimes vivify an exposition of Aristotle, for instance, by a personal reminiscence of Trendelenburg. But one was always conscious of a certain severity and independent individuality in Dr. Martineau's intellectual history. He had deliberately acquired much, but had unconsciously absorbed comparatively little. He had had, so to speak, introductions to innumerable great scholars and thinkers, but Mr. Tayler seemed to be free of the guild, and to be naturally borne along on a great academic tradition. And this was the more noteworthy because the characteristics were reversed when it came to a question of psychological insight and knowledge of charcater. Tayler was in-need beautifully accessible and human, but he knew just so much of us as had been revealed by overt act; just so much of our difficulties or perplexities as was capable of being quite simply and definitely expressed, and as we had laid before him. Martineau most of us found somewhat inaccessible; but, if we dared to take our courage in both hands and fairly break the ice, we found that he knew, as if by instinct, all that was going on in our thoughts and minds. We did not need to tell him anything, or if we did, he could unravel on half a hint the most intricate windings, bewilderments and self entanglements of intellectual or conscientious difficulties. It was the same in our college debates. Tayler was generous, large-hearted, and luminous in his treatment of any question that was before us; but there was no special insight into the processes of what we were pleased to call our minds displayed in his contributions to the debate. Whereas Martineau would often say, "I quite agree with Mr. So-and-so, when he says," and then he would say what Mr. So-and-so had been blunderingly feeling after, and had not only not said, but had not yet clearly thought, though, when the thing was put before him, he recognised that it was exactly what he had indeed been trying to think!

Again, in all matters of intellectual judgment as to the merits of systems, or the truth of abstract propositions,

Martineau (whatever questionings and weighings had preceded judgment) had a precise and emphatic verdict that admitted of no question; whereas on the practical issues of politics, for instance, he would often maintain an attitude as of judicial impartiality which checked our enthusiasm or even scandalised our moral passions. But Tayler on questions of abstract truth and speculation would sometimes seem to drive candour to the point of indecision. We had stories (founded on no inconsiderable basis of fact) of his diffidently expressing an opinion which he was aware might be the prejudice of an old man that Homer's Iliad was "superior to a great deal of the poetry written in our own day," or that on the whole the balance of evidence inclined, rather than not, in favour of the truth of Christianity. But when it came to practical questions of public morality, all this judicial reserve vanished. His moral indignation or enthusiasm would flash out with youthful energy and he knew no hesitancy. Many of us remember a college debate in the time of the American war in which Mr. Tayler had declared that he never recollected a conflict in which he could say more emphatically "this is the side of God, and that is the side of the Devil." When Martineau's turn came to speak, he said that though he seldom disagreed with his friend, Mr. Tayler, he must confess that for his part he never recollected a dispute in which he had found himself more utterly unable "to assign the motives of one party to a divine, those of the other, to a diabolic agency." The expressions were no less characteristic than the sentiments Perhaps simplicity and culture best express the impression that Mr. Tayler made on us. I do not know that he taught us very much in his Old Testament or Ecclesiastical history lectures, but we learned to know the lecturer himself; and that lesson we have never forgotten. It has been among the purifying and uplifting influences of our lives. Subtlety and insight were Dr. Martineau's characteristics, and these came to us coupled with the impress of a great and somewhat mysterious personality, kindling an enthusiasm, sometimes almost idolatrous, to which our memories will thrill as long as we remember anything.

As some of the decreasing number who shared the privilege of studying under these two teachers glance over these lines, they will doubtless cancel, supplement, endorse, or condemn these recollections, until there is little left to which all would subscribe; but at least the union of these two men in the grateful affection of a succession of pupils will furnish a common ground on which all will wish to see the name of John James Tayler enshrined in the centenary tribute rendered to James Martineau.

P. H. W.

We had hoped in this Centenary Number to publish a first notice of Mr. Carpenter's new book on Dr. Martineau; but it is not yet out as we go to press, though it is expected that by the end of the week some early copies may be available for Norwich.

DR. MARTINEAU AS PREACHER.

In a memorial article on Dr. Martineau The Spectator said of him: "Important as are such of his later works as the 'Types of Ethical Theory' or the 'Seat of Authority in Religion,' we have no hesitation in saying that in his wonderful sermons known collectively as 'Hours of Thought on Sacred Things' and in his 'Endeavours after the Christian Life,' the real Martineau, the spiritual teacher who will endure, has accomplished his greatest and finest work. Spirit speaks to spirit in these pages, which are worthy of the finest mysticism of the Catholic Church at her best, while at the same time manly, healthy, in harmony with human reason and couched in a singularly noble and remarkable prose style."

It is the fashion to speak rather slightingly of sermons as religious literature. No doubt, the vast majority of the thousands of sermons preached every Sunday are not suitable for publication. They have been too hurriedly composed, or they are too topical or too commonplace. But, after all, sermons are supposed to be, and often are, the best thoughts of some of the most serious minds in the community upon the meaning of life and the problems of duty. They are the expression of the hopes, the faith, the intellectual conceptions of men who are, or ought to be, persistently seeking to live in the spirit, and to feel and to understand the beauty, the responsibility, and the goodness of human life.

"In virtue of the close affinity," says Dr. Martineau, "perhaps ultimate identity, of Religion and Poetry, preaching is, essentially a lyric expression of the soul, an utterance of meditation in sorrow, hope, love, and joy, from a representative of the human heart in its divine relations." That definition, if strictly taken, tends to ignore the preacher as prophet and to regard him only as poet.

The difference between the psalmist and the prophet, speaking generally, is that the psalmist gives expression to the joys and the sorrows, the temptations and the fears of the inner life, always seeking to find comfort and strength in relationship with God; while the prophet, looking at the complexities and the difficulties of human conduct, stands forth in the name of the Lord to rebuke, to encourage, to assert eternal principles of action. They are both mystics—the psalmist expressing his feelings "sub specie æternitatis" and the prophet expressing his sense of what is right under the same form. But Dr. Martineau's description of preaching as "a lyric expression of the soul, an utterance of meditation in sorrow, hope, love, and joy," applies far more to the preacher as poet than to the preacher as prophet. It is not a complete description of his own sermons, which are concerned with duties quite as much as with feelings and with thoughts. It is evident that it was the effect of poetry at which Dr. Martineau consciously aimed. In his preface to the first edition of his first volume of sermons he says that its title "expresses the spirit more than the matter of the book; —which 'endeavours' to produce rather than to describe the essential temper of 'the Christian Life.'" To change the temper of life by touching the emotions and stimulating thought, by deepening the affections and appealing to the imagination —this is the work of the preacher as poet. No doubt much of Dr. Martineau's preaching is of this type. But there is also a prophetic note often struck; sometimes it is seen in denouncing evil, but more often in proclaiming principles of good. There is a danger of exaggerating the meditative and lyrical aspect of these sermons, partly owing to the poetical beauty of illustration and of language, partly owing to Dr. Martineau's own definition of preaching.

They are not only religious musings, but the utterance of one who believed that the will of God could be known, and who was filled with the longing that His will should prevail.

The level not only of style, but of thought and spirit, is curiously uniform, from the first sermon to the last.

The first volume of the Endeavours was published in 1843, and the second in 1847. The first volume of the "Hours of Thought" was published in 1876, and the second in 1879. Thus a period of 36 years divided the first collection of sermons from the last. During that time many momentous changes had taken place in Dr. Martineau's opinions about the New Testament and the nature and the powers of Jesus: his philosophical conceptions had been altered and enlarged. Philosophically indeed, as he tells us, he had passed through an intellectual re-birth by a study of Aristotle and Hegel, at Berlin in 1848. He was abreast of all the changing thought of the time, and in his own mind he was ever growing and was not afraid to change. The discoveries and theories of Darwin must have affected him deeply, and demanded a revision of his thought. But in the sermons preached through this eventful period there is very little evidence of change. The chief difference we have noticed is not in theology, but in sociology. There is more social indignation in the earlier sermons, there is a serener and perhaps a more conservative temper in the "Hours of Thought." Such utterances as the following from the "Endeavours" are more characteristic of the earlier than later sermons:—

"I know not which is most heathenish, the guilty negligence of our lofty men, or the fearful degradation of the low. But this I do believe, that unless some holier spirit dart quickly down for the conversion of our rich and great, put into them a wise and Christian heart, and dispose them to sacrifices never dreamt of yet, our social repentance will come too late." In a later sermon in the same volume he says: "Tyrants and self-seeking rulers are, by nature, Machiavellian moralists; they have no faith but in the most vulgar incentives to action, and are familiar with no engines of influence but force and corruption. While the sunshine smiles upon his palace, and glances from the sword of faithful troops, he despises the gathering clouds of a nation's frown; till suddenly the tempest bursts upon the hills and the heavy tramp, as of the men of toil, thunders on the ground, and after a flash of vented wrath, the veterans and their leader lie low upon the field, and the thanksgiving of the free goes up into a sky serene.'' Passages of similar social indignation will be found in the sermons on the Free-Man of Christ and the Good Soldier of Jesus Christ. The tone of the later sermons is seen in such a passage as the following, from the second volume of the "Hours of Thought": "The coercion of the law, and the tumult of the people spend themselves in vain against the devout sense of right. You may barricade the streets with devils; but Luther goes to Worms. You may pour over Bohemia the damps of German philosophy, and the chill of imperial displeasure; but the fire of reformation will burn the more, and though it consume the prophets, will glorify the faith. You may deliver a Thomas More from the bench in Chancery to the gaoler in the Tower; you may have his head, but not his voice against a pure and noble queen. . . . To these men's eyes there is revealed a higher court and auguster Judge, before whom they stand with uncovered soul, and who is already hearing their appeal. The verdict will be given in its season. The tongue of time and truth will not be for ever dumb.'' There is, of course, no kind of opposition between this and the preceding, but there is a difference of emphasis. There is less indignation and desire for change: there is more serenity and trust in the final triumph of God.

But from the point of view of theological doctrine, we must confess we find no change, and this unity of religious teaching is due not to sameness of mental conception, nor even to a feeling that doctrines are unimportant, but to a depth of spiritual life which was independent of doctrines. No sermons have more effectually proved how little a belief in the Trinity or Unity of God, or this view or that view of Christ, have to do with religion. They prove it, not by talking about liberality, or by urging that religion is deeper than doctrine. They prove it simply by their own nature. They are the sermons of a man who was a profound theologian and philosopher, a man whose theology and philosophy were always developing. But we find that however much his theology and philosophy may change, his religious teaching is always the same. He proves the unimportance of different views about the Bible and Jesus Christ by the fact that the spiritual effect of his sermons is exactly the same however his theological views may change. In the first volume of "Hours of Thought" he says: "This volume represents, on the whole, a considerably later stage of feeling and experience than the 'Endeavours,' but essentially the same views of life, the same conception of the order of the world, the same interpretation of the Christian mind will still meet the reader, for they remain unaffected by the real discoveries of the last 25 years.'' It is easy enough for a mere mystic to say this, and to practise it, a man who has not concerned himself with the critical and scientific developments of the time, a man who is unperturbed by theological developments because he has ignored or despised them. But from a man like Dr. Martineau, keenly interested and profoundly versed in theological controversy, such a statement is full of significance. To him the faith in God and the soul was untouched by any change in the authority of the Bible and the nature of Christ. His sermons came out of the depth of his own experience; they are the words of one who is in personal relationship with God. He is not concerned to show that a modern liberal in religion with "advanced" views about the Bible and Christ, can be just as religious as anybody else. There is often an element of advocacy or fear in such arguments. For him there is no question about the reality of God's love and the divinity of the soul, whatever happens to the Bible. He ignores change of critical views, because it is so utterly irrelevant. For this reason his sermons are truly catholic. They can be read, they are read, by thousands whose theological conceptions are quite different from Dr. Martineau's without hurting their feelings or rousing opposition. They belong to the Church Universal because they are the witness of the soul to God. Lit up by noble imagery, adorned with a rare beauty of language, permeated by a deep knowledge of the heart of man, they are the words of one who lived in immediate communion with God, and who from youth to age with ever growing conviction found light and strength and peace in the love of God, as it was revealed in the spirit and the character of Christ.

THE NORWICH APPEAL.

Sir,—The programme of the Martineau Centenary Meetings in Norwich and our appeal for the Martineau Memorial Hall are now in the hands of all our ministers. As most of them will be making reference to Dr. Martineau on Sunday, may I ask them to mention our appeal, and to urge their members to send contributions according to their means. The subscribers at present are few. And while we hope our friends will be as generous as they can, we wish to see the list of contributors, which will be preserved, as long as possible. Perhaps some of the congregations will be prepared to send a collective sum in the name of their church. Let all who reverence the name of Martineau send something.

Some sincere and natural intercourse with the poor and suffering, some vivifying contact with struggles and sorrows not our own, is indispensable to the discipline of character as well as to the fulfilment of duty; and the frequent tendency to substitute for the real compassions and executed labours of love, the fictitious griefs of the drama or the tale which genius fetches from scenes of misery to fling into the lap of ease, will be found, if it lead to no personal action, not a source of strength, but an enervating delusion. Not so, but by standing face to face with the injured natures and grievous lot we would redeem, by meeting them eye to eye and speaking to them in the vernacular language of the true heart, can we vindicate the communion of all orders and ages of men with one another and with God, as kindred branches of the great family of souls.

OBITUARY.

MRS. GEORGE COOPER.

The Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, has lost one of its oldest and most loyal members through the death of Mrs. George Cooper, who passed away, in her eighty-first year, on the 10th inst. Mrs. Cooper was born at Leicester, December 31, 1824, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Coltman, and in her girlhood she attended the ministry of the Rev. Charles Berry, of whom she always spoke with deep affection, tracing her earliest religious impressions to his teaching. While still little more than a child, Sarah Coltman came with her mother to reside at Gateshead, and became attached to the Unitarian Church in Newcastle. Her sister Mary married Mr. Joseph Clephan, for many years the honoured treasurer of the Church. Many years ago Mrs. Cooper was left a widow, her husband dying in America. After his death she lived for a time at Tynemouth, but as age advanced she removed to Gosforth in order to be nearer her church, and in closer touch with her friends in Newcastle. Even when her strength began to fail, her vigorous will and genial spirits enabled her to undertake duties which might have taxed the strength of earlier years. If it was possible by any means to get to church she was never absent from the Sunday services. Her love for the Unitarian Faith was intense. Her chief reading was in its literature; and the peace it brought to her in seasons of sadness and weakness was continued unbroken until the hour when she fell asleep. Especially were her sympathies roused by the appeals of our weaker churches. Every year she collected a small of money for Miss Sharpe's fund in aid of struggling congregations in the south. On one occasion after her seventieth year, hearing that no lay preacher could be found to take the services one Sunday at Barnard Castle, she at once undertook the duty, travelling there for the week-end, and so conducted the services and preached, that those who were present were much moved by the pathos of the scene. In 1901 she found great joy in accompanying a pilgrim band to Catterick, to visit the church of Theophilus Lindsay; fifty years before, she had made a similar pilgrimage with the Rev. George Harris, who delivered an eloquent address on the occasion. The last occasion on which Mrs. Cooper was present at church was June, 1904, when the jubilee of the present building was celebrated. It is impossible to say how much she will be missed, not only by her own relations, but also by an intimate circle of friends, and by the whole congregation to whom her presence has been familiar for so long.

The funeral service was conducted on the Wednesday following her death in the Church of the Divine Unity by the Rev. Frank Walters, and after cremation at Darlington the ashes were laid in the family vault in the Jesmond Old Cemetery, Mr. Walters again conducting the committal service.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HUNDRED years ago yesterday, April 21, 1805, James Martineau was born; and as the grown up people are celebrating his birth with love and reverence, I should like the children too to have their share; and though you cannot yet read and understand the books which he wrote, I hope when you are older these books may be dear companions to you, and guides to noble thoughts and deeds, and that you may learn to understand his thoughts and know what made him great. But meanwhile, while you are still children, I should like you to see something of him in his life at home, and know what manner of man he was. His was a French family, who came over from France long before his time, driven away by persecution, and taking refuge in England.

Well, to begin at the beginning, James Martineau's first home was in the old town of Norwich, where his father was a manufacturer of stuffs called bombazine. James was the seventh out of eight children, and the sister who was three years older than he told how she remembered a day when she was set down on a stool beside a nurse, who laid across the little girl's knees a bundle of flannel, out of which peeped the wee face of a tiny baby. That was her little brother James, and she was Harriet Martineau, who afterwards wrote so many charming stories—the "Crofton Boys," "Settlers at Home," "Feats on the Fjord," "Peasant and Prince," and many others.

From that first day James became her special darling and friend among the sisters and brothers. Not much has been told of him as a very little boy; but our grandmother used to tell us that he wore a little nankeen frock, and, as he was a pale child, his face looked nearly the same colour as his frock, and he was called a "nankeen boy." Two little stories about him remain, but these were of a later time, when he could read and learn by heart. One day he was stripping currants for his mother, it was a sticky, messy job, and he got very tired of it, and would have liked to give it up; but he went on, and his mother heard him repeat to himself two lines of a hymn—showing that he had already, as a very little boy, learnt that he must not shrink from what was troublesome or painful.

> The man of Calvary triumphed here;—

The other story is, that he had stayed at home when the rest went to chapel, and when they came back his mother asked James what he had done in their absence. He answered that he had read all through the Book of Isaiah. "Oh no, James," said his mother, "you should not say so; you can't have done that." "Yes I have, mother," said James, "skipping the nonsense, you know."

When he was ten years old James was sent as a day-scholar to the Grammar School, which was close to the beautiful old cathedral. He attended there for four years. He used to tell us that he was not very happy there, as the big boys bullied the little boys and fagged them; but he learnt to endure "hardness," and to be good and brave. He told us often how a big stupid boy used to make him do his Latin exercises for him, till he got tired of it, and so one day he wrote in the big boy's book a nonsense verse, with nearly every word wrong. The big boy showed up his book without looking at it, and got a thrashing for it, which (as my father used to say) "he passed on to me."

His elder brothers used to take James to the river to bathe, and they taught him to swim by making him jump in where the water was quite deep, and then telling him to swim to them. He became a very good swimmer.

After his four years at the Norwich Grammar School he went to Dr. Carpenter's school at Bristol, where he was very happy, and felt as if a new life had begun for him under the good man whom he loved and reverenced. He was two years there, and on leaving he went to Derby to learn engineering. But a great longing had grown up in him, while with Dr. Carpenter, to be a minister, and after a year of engineering his father granted his great wish and sent him to college at York. After five years there of study and friendship, he went to be master of Dr. Carpenter's school, where he had been pupil, while Dr. Carpenter was away ill; and he was there a year, after which he married, and went as minister to Dublin, where he had his home for three years. A little girl was born to him, but she did not live long; and then came a little boy, Russell, and afterwards another little girl. With these two little children and their mother, the father went to Liverpool in 1832, to be minister there.

It is in the Liverpool life that my memory begins, for there all the rest of us were born—the other five children. So now I will tell you some of the things that I remember about father, from the days of our childhood

I can remember from the earliest days how busy father was, and we were always taught not to make any noise near his study so as to disturb him; and when we went to the charming new house, Park Nook, he had double doors to his study, and we used sometimes, when he was out, to shut ourselves in between the two doors, where it was quite dark, and feel it rather terrible! His study was always beautifully neat, set round with bookcases full of nicely bound books; and he never went out without putting away his writing, and leaving his table perfectly tidy. But when he had a little time to spare he was the best of playfellows. I remember games of "hunt the slipper" in which he tried to hide the slipper under his long legs or his coat tails; and games of "hide and seek" all over the house, and how, when we had discovered him behind a door or a curtain, there came the kind of glorious terror of running down the stairs with leaps and bounds, with him flying after. Then I recall the absurd faces which he used to make, to amuse us, and the sort of alarm with which we remembered being told of someone who pulled a face and could never get right again, and we cried out, "Oh, papa, come right, or you'll stick!" and how he laughed as his face took its proper shape again. Then he would put the smallest child on his shoulders, and make her stand quite upright, and then ride her round the room; she drew her fingers along the top of the door ledge to see how much dust there was—he holding her by her arms, and then with a great swirl, heels over head, landed her on the ground. That turn-over was a sort of terrible pleasure—he was so tall, and the ground so far off. Or, sitting on a chair with his legs crossed, he would set one of the little ones standing on his foot, and holding her hands he would toss her up and down and give her a beautiful ride, till at last she learnt with sorrow that she had grown too heavy.

These stories must serve for to-day, but I hope to tell you more next week. But is it not delightful to think that the man who was so wise and so rich in thought, who wrote his sermons in the quiet behind those double doors, and the learned lectures by which he taught the young ministers studying at the College, and who taught his children Greek, Latin, History, and Mathematics, could so enjoy a regular romp, and be so capital a playfellow?

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit is entitled "'A Little Leaven': The True Office of Unitarian Churches. A Sermon for the Yorkshire Unitarian Union."

THE Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LLB., of Sheffield, has been appointed honorary secretary of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, in succession to Mr. J. Cogan Conway, deceased.

AT a lecture given recently by our friend, the Rev. R. Balmforth, at Cape Town, on "Ruskin as a Social Reformer," a long letter was read from Mrs. Cronwright-Schreiner ("Olive Schreiner") expressing regret at inability to preside, and specially commending Ruskin's work towards social reform. Incidentally, she described her "one little glimpse of Ruskin." She said: "Several years ago I was staying at a solitary farmhouse on the heights above Miller's Dale, in Derbyshire. Going down one morning for a walk alone in the valley, and scrambling down a steep bank, I found myself in the bed of the river. There was a little island of white sand in the middle of the water, and all around on the banks of the stream were trees, and foxgloves and harebells grew under them. On the little sand island a white-haired man and a younger woman were very busy taking a photograph of the beautiful bed of the stream. I noticed the man especially, with his keen, intent face. They were both so happy and absorbed in their work that they did not in any way break for me the beauty and peace of the scene, and I should have liked to stay and watch them; but I feared to disturb them, and scrambled up the opposite bank and went away. A little higher up the valley at a small inn I heard that those I had seen were Ruskin and the cousin or niece who lived with him. I have always treasured that memory of him; standing surrounded by the beauty and nature he loved, and busy at the work that had been his all his life—trying to catch the reflection of truth and beauty to make them permanent and visible to others."

THEY THAT DWELL IN LIGHT.

THE Easter Festival brings with it always commemoration of the great joy of our life, the deep conviction of its abiding and divine significance, a calm resting in the thought of Eternal Love, communion for the lowly in heart, which opens visions of the blessedness into which they shall be led, far beyond the power of any human heart as yet to conceive. Now, as the earth puts on again her robe of beauty and of joy, and the spirit of innocent gladness stirs on every side, the cycle of faith also comes round, quickened anew by holy memories, and the heart rejoices again to lay hold on life, to enter more deeply into the unseen things of the spirit, to know that all things work together for good to them that love GOD.

Easter is the festival of life and renewed victory of the good that endures. There is the steadfastness of the faithful who hunger after righteousness, the martyr's victory over pain; and out of the shadow of the grievous tragedy the dawning of a new day, purity and peace and love triumphant over death. In the fellowship of Christ's disciples each one has his own place consecrated by the one spirit of love and trust, pledged to the one great ideal of service, happy even in the lowliest place to be in the Father's household. And for each one there is the special circle of friends, of those who have been and are the nearest in love, in the controlling power of high aims and pure affection. Is it a father's or a mother's love, or the tender appeal of a little child, who passed first into the unseen, or the equal companionship of brother or sister, the perfect confidence of friends, or even in the closest bond of all, the breaking of which seemed the utter desolation of life, but brought a holier communion still, or is it the inspiration of a revered teacher, an interpreter of the great and noble things of life, a revealer of its consecrated purpose? They all come, thronging the silence with familiar vision and beloved voices, and the heart knows its own. With God, in the knowledge of His love, we are held secure in that communion, and have each one our own secret companionship, for abiding strength and peace, uplifting and purifying, that we may be led into the more perfect life.

This year we have a special commemoration and thanksgiving. On Good Friday, sacred to the memory of the holiest self-renunciation and the birth of the new faith in life triumphant over death, falls the hundredth anniversary of the birthday of one whom we remember with reverence and great thankfulness, as among modern teachers our chief interpreter of the things of the spirit and quickener of faith in the divine significance of life, while all the time himself in the place of a lowly disciple, very near to the mind and heart of CHRIST.

Only five years ago JAMES MARTINEAU passed from our midst, and at the close of his wonderful life, so noble and beautiful in spirit, so rich in abundant achievement and the great gifts he gave to men, the tribute of love and honour was fully paid, so that it might now seem that there is no new thing to be said concerning him. The story of his life has been fully told, and is this year told again with studious care and reverent insight, and we have the great wealth of his teaching in books which are an abiding possession for us all.

What we desire in this commemoration is not to find some new thing to say, but to realise more fully, and to help others to realise, what we have in him, what are the essential things in which he has such power to strengthen us, how we can gain more of his spirit, and be more worthy of the great gifts we have received from him. From his sermons, the "Endeavours after the Christian Life," and "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," we have taken some passages for this Easter Commemoration, and we could wish that this centenary may be marked by a renewed earnestness in the study of those sermons, as of his other great works, and of the volumes of essays which contain much of his finest and and most stimulating work. He is now among those who are "in the world of light," and the thought of him blends with that great communion of the unseen for which especially at this time we give humble and heartfelt thanks; yet it seems but yesterday that he was in our midst, and we saw the light of his smile and felt the clasp of his hand. We read the familiar words, and the tones of his beautiful voice come thrilling through. Now those who knew him, and learnt of him while he was here, are allowed a new and happy intimacy in the purest fellowship of spirit. If we commemorate his life, it is that we may receive a new benediction out of the heart of his abiding faith and love.

MANIBUS DATE LILIA PLENIS.

CENTENARY LINES.

April 21, 1905.

SPRING's purest lilies, born again
Of genial sun and gentle rain,
Coronal of these full-orb'd years,
Full-handed bring—but not with tears.
  Tears are for powers unspent,
  For unfulfill'd intent,
  For buds decay'd unblown,
  And fruitless life, alone;
Not his who greatly sows and reaps
And, night's sweet respite granted, sleeps.

Come not with tears, nor come to raise
A panegyric pomp of praise;
His fame we cannot make or mar,
His peers alone his judges are.
  Let them, the great, the few,
  Assign the honours due;
  Let their august acclaim
  Applaud the Master's name,
While love doth wend her pilgrim way
To kneel before the shrine, and pray.

Lo, as we bow, before our eyes
What sacred memories arise—
A stately form, a silver'd brow,
A voice that thrill'd us—silent now:
  Silence, instead of speech,
  A hand we cannot reach,
  A love beyond recall,
  A grief that darkens all,
A yearning toward the farther shore,
Is this our portion evermore!

Oh for that voice, so sweetly grave,
That more than benediction gave—
Could he but speak, could we but hear,
We should forget the name of fear.
  What fatal power, alas!
  One little lustrum has,
  One briefest shade of death,
  To chill our feeble faith;
How soon we lose the light of trust,
Blind with a little mortal dust!

Rest, mournful heart, from struggle cease,
And love shall find the way of peace;
For love is Lord of thee and thine,
Love, that is human and divine:
  Behold the waking year,
  What miracle is here—
  A world of joy re-born,
  A resurrection morn!
Love robes itself in countless flowers
To shame these loveless fears of ours,

Oh, not with tears the lilies bring!
His harvest is perpetual Spring,
—The buds of faith, the surer will,
The mind enlighten'd, learning still;
  The deeper harmony,
  Hearts joined in charity;
  The music of the soul
  That, as the ages roll,
Breaks dawn-like thro' the cosmic strife
Prophetic of the Noon of Life.

O Light Eternal, who dost shed
Light to the living thro' the Dead,
A deeper bliss we pray thee give Unto the Dead thro' those who live:
  May love and duty bloom,
  Twin-flowers, beside the tomb,
  And twine in beauty there
  For ever fresh and fair,
For ever, while the sun and rain
Shall bring the lilies back again.

EASTER THOUGHTS FROM MARTINEAU.

The Symbol of the Cross.

Since the evening of Gethsemane how many lips, in the composure of prayer, have cried "Not my will but Thine be done"! to how many tortured hearts has the thought occurred, not without a pure content, "It is enough for the disciple to be as his master"! Has not the crucifix become for ages the symbol of grief divinely borne? has it not, generation after generation, been hid in the bosoms of thousands, sustaining the soul of self-denial, and reminding them not to faint beneath the cross of life? Has it not met the eye of many a lonely captive, and beguiled him to forget his chains, and from its meek image spread through his dungeon the holiest light? Has it not kept watch with the mother by night, as she bent over her sick child, and been to her soul as a star amid the infinite darkness of her sorrow? Pressed to the lips of the living and softly laid upon the breast of the dying, it has warmed the love of the Christian while he stays, and given him trust when 'tis time to go. This it is that gives a majesty so pure and touching to the historic figure of Christ: self-abandonment to God, uttermost surrender, without reserve or stipulation, to the guidance of the Holy Spirit from the Soul of souls; pause in no darkness, hesitation in no perplexity, recoil in no extremity of anguish, but a gentle unfaltering hold of the invisible Hand, of the Only Holy and All Good—these are the features that have made Jesus of Nazareth the dearest and most sacred image to the heart of so many ages; and could these be but a delusive show of perfection, unrelated to the system of eternal verity, human life would sink at once from the sublimest to the most pitiable of things, the inflation of a romance, the tears and raptures of a dream, and it were then the highest wisdom, as well as the most passionate despair, to curse God and die. The very suspicion should be repelled as a temptation. Let us simply trust the good man's trusts, and fling ourselves into the Everlasting Arms that have cherished and protected the faithful and saintly of all times. Abide with us, O Lord, and breath into us the peace of hearts stayed upon Thee!

Self-Abnegation.

The sentiment of utter self-surrender to God is not only distinctively Christian, but is everywhere, in the writings of St. Paul, fixed, as to its very focus, on the central act of Christ's existence—his death upon the cross. That act, regarded as the free acceptance of a lot possible but not holy to escape, as the giving of himself away, as the yielding of the divinest humanity to the deepest humiliation, is held up by the Apostle as the very type and image of the Christian mind, and as spreading the blessed contagion of self-sacrifice through the disciples' band; who are to feel at one with him in his choice of the anguish and his rising into life; for whom all other and more shrinking course is not less closed than if they had hung with him on the cross, and whispered in his words "It is finished," and left all mortal lingerings like the grave-clothes in his tomb, and with him ascended into the unreluctant affections of a saintlier world. Do they call themselves by his name—the Crucified? Then the plunge is taken, and self is gone! As the water of baptism closed over them, in that moment their past was sunk to rise no more; and the figure that then emerged was a new creation, the personal form alone the same, but now possessed and moved by the heavenly Christ that liveth in its life. No language is too intense for the Apostle to express his sense of the absolute identity between discipleship and self-abnegation.

The Strength of Faithfulness.

If it is permitted to the enlightened but baffled statesman, when deserted and fallen from his place, to appeal from the voices of the moment to the judgment of more impartial times, with what right can we call in question the loftier form of the same prophetic trust which looks to a present God rather than to future men? The martyr of conscience—must he not know himself charged with a truth which is not his own—with a sacred claim which he did not set up and of which he is an appointed organ? and when cast out on their account, whither shall he take them for hope and shelter but to the Everlasting Love that will not let them die? A guiltless exile in the world, may he not seek his last retreat and say, "I flee unto thee to hide me?" The secret belief that the Lord of conscience loves and accepts each faithful sacrifice is the ultimate and sufficient support of all goodness; dispensing with the chorus of approving voices, replacing all vain self-reliance with a Divine strength, and with the peace of a reconciled nature consoling the inevitable sorrows—of a devoted life.

Nothing can well be conceived more at variance with the meek purity, the quiet trust, the reverent yet unfearing spirit of Christ, and with the secret faith which these imply, than this doctrine of Sovereign Will: as unlike the native truth, as the hard lines of thought, and stern gaze of temper on Calvin's face, to the clear deep eye, and look of loving sorrow in the upturned countenance of Christ. Listen to the tone of his most pathetic yet divinest hours. When he knelt within Gethsemane, did he bow before the Father, as before One having the right of property in him, and lie still to be crushed by irresistible decree? When he said, "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it," did he mean only that there was no help for it, as Infinite Power was against him?—or, that the bitterness might be forgot, and the death embraced as life, when adminstered by One who pursued the purest and sublimest ends, and made the faithful perfect through suffering? Did Jesus learn anything to be right, by knowing it to be the Divine Will? or did he not rather know the Divine Will, by his consciousness of what was right? For my own part, I can form no intelligible conception of his inspiration, if not as the spontaneous and mystic uprising within him of thoughts of duty and affection, so self-evidencing, so incontrovertible, so divine, that they came to him as the whispered mind, and from him as the spoken oracle, of God.

"He Bore our Griefs."

It was needful for the Christ to suffer, if he were to be the emblem of the life of man in its most sacred form. Otherwise indeed his lot would not have been truly human, and would have attracted, not the fruitful sympathy, but the barren longings of struggling men. His exemption from grief would have removed no disciple's sorrows; his endurance has consecrated them all; has shown how much higher may be the spirit that can glorify them, than the skill that can escape them; has revealed to us how small a part of them may be their painfulness. No one who has followed the steps of the prophet of Nazareth, and listened in thought to his voice of sad affection, and beheld him in his lonely watch by night with full and earnest eye upon the stars, and overheard the farewell converse when he bequeathed his peace, and seen how on Calvary even the cross could lose its power to impart disgrace, and rather received an everlasting glory, can longer feel amazed that one who was to elicit what is holy from our life, should be so deeply acquainted with grief.

Undying Hope.

Throughout the decorative emblems and inscriptions in the early Christian cemeteries it has been remarked, one uniform character may be observed—their spirit of cheerfulness and hope. By some fresh breath the gloom seems all swept out from the chamber of so many griefs; and a sweet and placid light to fill the place, other than the glare of earthly day, and like an enclosure of starlight from the skies. The images and pictures on the walls exclude all the horrors, and present only the sanctity of death, assuring us that the survivors kept over it a secure and quiet vigil, invested it with peaceful thoughts, and looked through it to a holy and passionless existence. There, the evergreen leaf protests, in sculptured silence, that the winter of the grave cannot touch the saintly soul: the blossoming branch speaks of vernal suns beyond the snows of this chill world: the good Shepherd shows, from his benign looks, that the mortal way, so terrible to nature, had become to those Christians as the meadow path, between the grassy slopes and beside the still waters.

The Christian Time-View.

We are here to try and train our faculties for great achievements and harmonious residence within the will of God. Nor is the theatre unworthy of our best endeavours. Only let us not, in action or in suffering, sink down upon the present moment as if that were all. Amid the strife and sorrow that await us, let us remember that the ills of life are not here on their own account, but are as a divine challenge and godlike wrestling in the night with our too reluctant wills: and since, thus regarded, they are truly evil no more, let us embrace the conflict manfully, and fear no defeat to any faithful will. When all is well with us in this world, let us not forget that its enjoyments also are not here on their own account: the cup is not to be tossed off in careless draughts. They too stand in relation to the affections and character of soul, and thence derive their truest worth; it were sin to take them to our selfish sensibilities alone, and they must warm us with a grateful and a generous mind, more trustful in the love of God, more prompt with a true pity for man. And when we best and most strenuously follow the obligations of our career, we can permit no flutter of self-gratulation to disturb the quiet meekness of the heart. For only look up on that which we dare to hope, and how are our mightiest achievements dwarfed. All insufficient in themselves—poor spellings-out of the mere alphabet of eternal wisdom—they are but signs of willing pupilage—the upturned look of a disciple sitting at the feet. As symbols of faith and service, God will be graciously pleased to accept them from us; and discern in them the early essays of a soul that shall assume at length dimensions more dvine.

'Great Hopes for Great Souls.

In proportion as our nature rises in its nobleness, does it realise its immortality. As it retires from animal grossness, from selfish meanness, from pitiable ignorances, or sordid neglect—as it opens forth into its true intellectual and moral glory—do its doubts disperse, its affections aspire; the veil is uplifted from the future, the darkness breaks away, and the spirit walks in dignity within the paradise of God's Eternity. What a testimony this to the great truth from which our hope and consolations flow! What an incitement to seek its bright and steady light by the culture of every holy faculty within us! The more we do the will of our Father, the more do we feel that this doctrine is indeed of Him. Its affinities are with the loftiest parts of our nature; and, in our trust in it, we ally ourselves with the choicest spirits of our race. And while we sympathise with them in their past faith, we prepare to meet them where we may assume their nearer likeness. Ever seek we therefore the things which are above.

The Communion of Saints.

Soon, we too shall drop the note of earthly aspiration, and join that upper anthem of diviner love. The hour cometh, when we shall cease the mournful cry with which earth must ever pray to heaven, and grief ask pity to its tears, and the tempted call for help in the crisis of danger, and the labouring will implore a freshened strength. Exiles as yet from the spirit of unanxious joy, we catch but the echoes of that heavenly peace, and yield response but faint and low. Yet even now the free heart of the happy and triumphant shall be ours, in proportion as we are true to the condition of faithful service, which alone can make us one with them. The communion of saints brings to us their conflict first, their blessings afterwards; those who will not with much patience strive with the evil can have no dear fellowship with the good; we must weep their tears, ere we can win their peace. This sorrowful condition once accepted the sympathies of heaven are not slow to arise within the soul: it is the tension of sacred toil, that on the touch of every breath of life brings music from the chords of love. And then the tone that here sinks in the silence of death, shall there swell into an immortal's fuller praise. We shall leave it to others to take up the supplicating strain; shall join the emancipated brotherhood of the departed, and in our turn look down on the outstretched hands of our children, waiting our welcome and embrace. O! may the Great Father, in his own fit time, unite in one the parted family of heaven and earth!

The Messengers of Change.

If, then, the very law of life is a law of change; if every blossom of beauty has its root in fallen leaves; if love, and thought, and hope would faint beneath too constant light, and need for their freshening the darkness and the dews; if it is in losing the transient that we gain the Eternal; then let us shrink no more from sorrow, and sigh no more for rest; but have a genial welcome for vicissitude, and make quiet friends with loss and Death. Through storm and calm, fresh be our courage, and quick our eye, for the various service that may await us. Nay, when God himself turns us not hither and thither, when He sends us no changes for us to receive and consecrate, be it ours to create them for ourselves by flinging ourselves into generous enterprises and worthy sacrifice; by the stirrings of sleepless aspiration, and all the spontaneous vicissitudes of holy and progressive souls; keeping always the moral spaces round us pure and fresh by the constant thought of truth and the frequent deed of love. And then, when, for us, too, death closes the great series of mortal changes, the past will lie behind us green and sweet as Eden, and the future before us in the light of eternal peace. Tranquil and fearless we shall resign ourselves to God, to conduct us through that ancient and invisible way, which has been sanctified by the feet of all the faithful, and illumined by the passage of the Man of griefs.

Rest in the Lord.

In him alone, but in him for ever, there is Rest. In evil days, when just men strive in vain to beat back the hosts of wrong, and mad tyrannies gall the heart with shouts of triumph, the Sentinel of every world is on his sleepless watch, and knows how to protect it from surprise. He is the continuous thread of all our years, and his love throws in each pattern of beauty woven into their texture: and when the images of the past, the distant fields, the dear abode, the gracious forms, the vivid hopes, the earnest heroisms, of our young days, gleam with a fairer light through the sorrows and failures of maturity, it is his breathing spirit that dissipates the cloud of time, and sends his reviving sunshine through. Only let us be at one with him, and our life gathers down upon it the strength of his infinite serenity. The simple thought, that "God is here"—that the august Ordainer of our trust and supporter of our faithfulness is present in the very hiding-places of the soul—contains within it the most powerful agencies of religion. Warning, sympathy, and rest are treasured in it to inexhaustible amount. Amid the fatigues of life's incessant struggle, under the sense that we can never sleep or all things will go wrong, refreshment is instantly gained when we ascend to the fountain of all affection, and touch the parching lips with the draft of life. In temptations to unfaithfulness witnessed by no human eye, let us but say, "Ah! Lord, but thou art here," and the failing purpose springs to its feet again. And under the encroachments of fretfulness or despondency from the frequent perverseness of men, what can so soon check the hasty thought, soothe the unquiet passion, and put a music of patience into the soul, as the look of that pure and loving eye from its depth of infinite calm? In the trembling of age and the stealthy approaches of the last sleep, the dear presence of an Almighty Guardian, to whom age is as childhood and who unites the future with the past, fills the deepening shadows with a mild and holy light. Let him alone be near; and the obscuring veil of mortal ill that sometimes seems to shut us in, and tempts us to believe in nothing but the sad rain, is soon withdrawn, like the cloud lifting itself from out of the glen; and the sunshine first glorifies, then dissipates the haze; leaving the mountain-range of immovable goodness and beauty clear against the everlasting sky. So pass the storms away, so deepens the heavenly view, to the soul that will but "rest in the Lord and wait patiently for him."

DR. MARTINEAU'S HYMNS.

A constant source of refreshment and inspiration Dr. Martineau found in the study of the hymns of the Christian Church, and he himself gave a great gift to the Churches of the Liberal Faith in the successive hymn-books which he edited, and in his own three hymns, which are so precious to us now.

Writing in 1856 to thank Miss Susanna Winkworth for her edition of Tauler, Dr. Martineau said: "I see at once that the book will be, for the rest of my life, one of my sacred guides; and will stand, after my Bible, with Plato, and Leighton, and the 'Theologia Germanica,' and Coleridge, and Tennyson, and the German and Wesley hymns. A strange jumble, you will say, of heterogeneous springs of thought—yet all, I think, assuaging to the same thirst." And again, in 1869, writing to her sister Catharine, with thanks for her "Christian Singers of Germany," he said: "After the Scriptures, the Wesley hymn-book appears to me the grandest instrument of popular religious culture that Christendom has ever produced. But for the German antecedents, however, it would never have come into existence."

The first hymn-book Dr. Martineau edited is little known, but is of great interest as his first essay in that direction.

It was brought out in 1831 at Dublin, for his Eustace-street congregation, A Collection of Hymns for Christian Worship. There are only 273 hymns, and of these 18 are by Bishop Heber, whose merit is noted in the preface, as "first liberalising the style of poetry designed for our churches," and the preface pleads further for a wider latitude of choice in the selection of hymns, "bringing all the resources of lyric poetry (the poetry of the affections) into the service of religion."

Dr. Martineau's second book, Hymns for the Christian Church and Home, was brought out in 1840, and was first used by his congregation in Paradise-street Chapel, Liverpool, on All Saints' Day, which was a Sunday in that year. The sermon on "The Communion of Saints," which he preached on that occasion, was afterwards published in the first volume of his "Endeavours after the Christian Life." Two of his own hymns were included anonymously in this collection.

Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him.

THY way is in the deep, O Lord!
E'en there we'll go with thee;
We'll meet the tempest at thy word,
And walk upon the sea!

Poor tremblers at his rougher wind,
Why do we doubt him so?
Who gives the storm a path, will find
The way our feet shall go.

A moment may his hand be lost—
Drear moment of delay!
We cry, "Lord, help the tempest-tost,"
And safe we're borne away.

The Lord yields nothing to our fears,
And flies from selfish care;
But comes himself, where'er he hears
The voice of loving prayer.

O happy soul of faith divine!
Thy victory how sure!
The love that kindles joy is thine—
The patience to endure.

Come, Lord of peace! our griefs dispel,
And wipe our tears away;
'Tis thine to order all things well,
And ours, to bless the sway.

With his stripes we are healed.

A VOICE upon the midnight air,
Where Kedron's moonlit waters stray,
Weeps forth, in agony of prayer,
"O Father! take this cup away!"

Ah! thou who sorrowest unto death,
We conquer in thy mortal fray;
And Earth, for all her children, saith
"O God, take not this cup away!"

O Lord of sorrow! meekly die:
Thou'lt heal or hallow all our woe
Thy name refresh the mourner's sigh,
Thy peace revive the faint and low.

Great Chief of faithful souls! arise;
None else can lead the martyr-band,
Who teach the brave, how peril flies,
When Faith, unarmed, uplifts the hand.

O King of earth! the cross ascend:
O'er climes and ages 'tis thy throne:
Where'er thy fading eye may bend,
The desert blooms, and is thine own.

Thy parting blessing, Lord, we pray;
Make but one fold below, above:
And when we go the last lone way,
O give the welcome of thy love.

The authorship of these hymns was for many years not publicly acknowledged, though it was an open secret, and when the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, in a new edition of his hymnal, first published in 1884, by accident put the author's name to "Thy way is in the deep, O Lord," Dr. Martineau in reply to his explanation and apology said, "When I wrote that hymn, forty years ago, I think I had some German one running in my head, and so did not like to claim it as mine." But since the publication in 1872 of the "Letters of John James Tayler," the authorship was publicly known, for in a letter to Dr. Martineau in 1857, Mr. Tayler had written, at a time of great stress and anxiety to both of them, "When you feel depressed, dear friend, I must refer you to your own beautiful hymn, 'Thy way is in the deep, O Lord.' In many sad moments of the last few weeks I have recurred to it again and again, and found the strength and comfort I wanted."

Dr. Martineau's third book, Hymns of Praise and Prayer, first published in 1873, contained these two and another hymn of his own, which should be remembered as belonging to the period of his keenest championship of a spiritual philosophy of religion as against the prevalent materialism of the day.

The inward witness of God.

"WHERE is your God?" they say:
Answer them, Lord most holy!
Reveal thy secret way
Of visiting the lowly:
Not wrapped in moving cloud,
Or nightly-resting fire;
But veiled within the shroud
Of silent, high desire.

Come not in flashing storm,
Or bursting frown of thunder:
Come in the viewless form
Of wakening love and wonder;—
Of duty grown divine,
The restless spirit, still;
Of sorrows taught to shine,
As shadows of thy will.

O God! the pure alone—
E'en in their deep confessing—
Can see thee as their own,
And find the perfect blessing:
Yet to each waiting soul
Speak in thy still, small voice,
Till broken love's made whole,
And saddened hearts rejoice.

We commend to lovers of hymnody these two hymn-books, and not least their prefaces. Of what Dr. Martineau contributed to his books as editor, a signal example will be found in two Milton hymns, on which some notes are here added.*

Milton, after his boyish exercise in translating Ps. 136 into English verse, "Let us with a gladsome mind," made a second attempt in 1648, when Parliament was considering the adoption of a better version of the Psalms than Sternhold and Hopkins. For this experiment he chose Psalms 80 to 88, which he translated straight from the original Hebrew and put his verses into the common metre then used for singing in church.

He judged, perhaps, that he had not succeeded very well, for he went no further with the attempt; but from some of his verses the two beautiful hymns were made, which Dr. Martineau arranged, by some alterations, and selection and arrangement of the verses, first published in his Hymns for the Christian Church and Home.

One hymn is taken from Milton's version of Psalm 84, which is a psalm of the pilgrims' thankfulness in having reached the great Temple at Jerusalem, after longing from a distance to be there; it speaks of the strength and gladness given to those who trust in God, and come together to worship Him. As we use it, it is a beautiful hymn of gladness and thankfulness, for those who meet together in the quiet House of Prayer.

Only part of the Psalm was used by Dr. Martineau in arranging the hymn, the verses 1, 6, 7, 11 and 12. Milton's first verse runs:—

How lovely are Thy dwellings fair!
O Lord of Hosts, how dear
The pleasant tabernacles are Where Thou dost dwell so near!

This verse, it will be seen, Dr. Martineau altered, but the other verses are as Milton wrote them, except that verse 12 is put second and changed to the plural, and one other line, "They pass through Baca's thirsty vale," is altered to "They pass refreshed the thirsty vale." This is the hymn as we sing it:—

How lovely are thy dwellings, Lord,
From noise and trouble free!
How beautiful the sweet accord
Of souls that pray to thee!

Lord God of hosts, that reign'st on high!
They are the truly blest,
Who only will on thee rely,
In thee alone will rest.

They pass refreshed the thirsty vale,
The dry and barren ground,
As through a fruitful, watery dale,
Where springs and showers abound.

They journey on from strength to strength,
With joy and gladsome cheer,
Till all before our God at length
In Zion do appear.

For God the Lord, both sun and shield,
Gives grace and glory bright:
No good from them shall be withheld
Whose ways are just and right.

It is interesting to see how the verses grow in the making of such a hymn, and the first verse of this 84th Psalm is a good example. In the Psalm itself the words are simply: "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!" This, in the old version of Sternhold and Hopkins, becomes:

How pleasant is thy dwelling-place,
O Lord of hosts, to me!
The tabernacles of thy grace,
How pleasant, Lord, they be.

The version by Rous was revised and published again in 1650, two years after Milton had written his, and from that time became the received version of the Scottish Church. In that book our verse is the same as in Sternhold and Hopkins, except in the first line, which is "How lovely is thy dwelling place." It will thus be seen that while the older versions with different expressions speak simply of the beautiful and pleasant House of Prayer, Dr. Martineau has added the further thought of what union in prayer is to the people who are gathered in it.

The other hymn is even more interesting in its origin. Its five verses are selected from Milton's version of three Psalms, to make a noble hymn of faith in the coming of the kingdom of God on earth. The following are the verses of the Psalms, as Dr. Martineau arranged them in the hymn : Psalm lxxxv. 13 and 11 ; lxxxvi. 9, 10. And this is the hymn as first printed in 1840 :—

* The rest of this article is for the most part reprinted from a little book, published by the Sunday School Association, "Twelve Hymns and Their Writers. Biographical Sketches and Lesson Notes," by V. D. Davis.

The Lord will come, and not be slow :
His footsteps cannot err :
Before him Righteousness shall go,
His royal harbinger.

Truth from the earth, like to a flower,
Shall bud and blossom then ;
And Justice, from her heavenly bower
Look down on mortal men.

Rise, Lord ! judge thou the earth in might ;
This longing earth redress ;
For thou art he who shall by right
The nations all possess.

The nations all whom thou hast made
Shall come, and all shall frame
To bow them low before thee, Lord,
And glorify thy name.

For great thou art, and wonders great
By thy strong hand are done ;
Thou, in thy everlasting seat,
Remainest God alone.

In the Supplement, which formed part of the old Norwich hymn-book of 1826, numbers 4, 2 and 5 of these verses appear, in that order, as a hymn, for the "Restoration of pure worship," and this was included by Dr. Martineau in his Dublin hymn-book of 1831 ; but then he felt that a finer hymn could be made from Milton's verses, and he began with another verse from Psalm 85, and took also the verse from Psalm 82, changing Milton's "wicked earth" into "longing earth." The opening verse we also owe to an alteration made with very happy effect. It is really the last verse of Psalm 85, "Righteousness shall go before him ; and shall set us in the way of his steps" ; or as the Revised Version reads, "shall make his footsteps a way to walk in." Of this Milton makes verse :—

Before him righteousness shall go,
His royal harbinger ;
Then will he come, and not be slow ;
His footsteps cannot err.

This concluding verse of Milton's Psalm, by inverting the order of the couplets, made a fine opening verse for the new hymn.

We have spoken here of these two hymns partly because they are beautiful in themselves, but partly also because they link together in our thoughts the names of Milton and Martineau. It is worth while to remember, when we use these hymns, that we owe them not only to the poet who made the version of those Psalms in the time of the Puritan revolt, when the Commonwealth was about to be established, but also to the diligent care and fine poetic feeling of the later editor, who sought to furnish for our churches a new wealth of hymns helpful and beautiful to sing.

And there is yet more to be learnt from the linking of these two names. For as Milton, in the seventeenth century, so nobly taught in his life, no less than in his poetry, the greatness of fidelity to duty and the strength of trust in God, so Martineau in the nineteenth century was our own prophet of righteousness, a teacher from whom we learnt, in the same spirit as from Milton, that in righteousness there is the strength of the living God. Of this it is that the hymn, "The Lord will come, and not be slow," which we may think of as belonging to these two men together, as to the Psalmist of old, speaks to us with so much power.

And it will be helpful to add a third name to these two : Milton, Wordsworth, Martineau. It is no idle fancy which links the name of Wordsworth with the other two, for they are men of kindred spirit, three of the noblest of Englishmen. Remember those beautiful passages in Wordsworth's "Excursion" describing the glory of the sunrise, and the reverence and thankfulness to God awakened in him by the beauty of the world, showing how deeply he felt the same truth as Milton in regard to the presence of God in Nature. And in other poems we see also that he had intense admiration for the simplicity and nobleness of Milton's character.

In the year 1802 Wordsworth wrote a number of sonnets in which he lamented the falling away of the English people from their great ideal of patriotism and fidelity to duty into luxury and worldliness, a lament which many might be inclined equally to make now, at the end of another hundred years. In one sonnet he complains that our life is now "only drest for show."

"The wealthiest man among us is the best ;
No grandeur now in nature or in book
Delights us. Rapine, avarice, expense,
This is idolatry ; and these we adore ;
Plain living and high thinking are no more ;
The homely beauty of the good old cause
Is gone ; our peace, our fearful innocence,
And pure religion breathing household laws."

And in the next sonnet, also dated London, 1802, he appeals directly to Milton :—

"Milton ! thou should'st be living at this hour ;
England hath need of thee ; she is a fen
Of stagnant waters : altar, sword, and pen,
Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower,
Have forfeited their ancient English dower
Of inward happiness. We are selfish men ;
Oh ! raise us up, return to us again ;
And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power.

Thy soul was like a star, and dwelt apart :
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea :
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
So didst thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness ; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay."

Yearning thus for a return of Milton's spirit, Wordsmorth was himself to be one of the chief of the inspiring forces which lifted the life of the English people to a higher level. Three years after the sonnet to Milton, he wrote his "Ode to Duty," which is one of the noblest utterances of that fundamental faith in righteousness of which afterwards James Martineau was to be the great interpreter ; and it is worth remembering, as an interesting coincidence, that may serve to mark a truth of deeper significance, that in the year 1805, in which Wordsworth wrote his ode, Martineau was born.

As the "Stern Daughter of the Voice of God," Wordsworth addresses Duty, yet as one who gives victory to those who follow her, freeing from temptation, calming "the weary strife of frail humanity." Towards the end comes that wonderful verse in which he pictures Duty or Righteousness as the law and the strength of the whole universe, while in the concluding verse he returns to the thought of the inward voice of Duty, and the obedience which makes a man truly free :—

"Stern Lawgiver ! yet thou dost wear
The Godhead's most benignant grace ;
Nor know we anything so fair
As is the smile upon thy face;
Flowers laugh before thee on their beds,
And Fragrance in thy footing treads ;
Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong ;
And the most ancient heavens, through Thee, are fresh and strong.

"To humbler functions, awful Power !
I call thee, I myself commend
Unto thy guidance from this hour ;
Oh, let my weakness have an end !
Give unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice ;
The confidence of reason give ;
And in the light of truth thy Bondman let me live !"

Thus we may complete the circle of our thought, binding these three great teachers together, each humble and devout with a great reverence and joy in the glory of the works of God, and the Divine presence in Nature, and each, no less, finding the strength of a true manhood, and the promise of heavenly life, in obedience to the inward law of duty and trust in the righteousness and love of God.

A PEASANT'S FUNERAL.

Only a peasant, whom peasants are now
After a harvest day, going to render
Back to the earth, tilled with sweat of his brow.

In the midst of the wood I overtook the schoolmaster. Judging from his black clothes that he had set out with the same object in view as myself, I asked him if he were making his way to Winthorpe Church to attend Debney's funeral. He said he was, and we walked on together. It was a warm summer afternoon. A clear sky with casual light clouds poured sunshine through the trees ; and, leaf and branch intercepting, the road was paved equally with patines of sun and shadow. At some distance, through the stems, we caught sight of a slowly moving file of black figures. They were on the road parallel to the path we were following. Walking two by two, six of the elders of the hamlet led the way. After them, guided by a boy, the dead man's pony and cart bearing his body. And then seven more couples, mostly women, including his grown-up children. Standing uncovered among the trees, we let the little procession pass and then followed at a short distance, talking of our late neighbour, whose venerable figure would be missed by all in the village. Not least, perhaps, by the boys, for he had lately been helping their master to clear and burn off the fuzzy half-acre which he was sturdily turning into a garden. Questions in Scripture lesson about the deluge always seemed to suggest to the children's brains less respecting the ancient navigator and his voyage to Mount Ararat than old Noah Debney in his mud cottage. But there was a more widespread tenderness to his memory. And yet there was no note of pathos in his end, nor any noteworthy quality by which he was remembered, save this—that he was always working. "Worked until he was just worked out!" "always did a day and a half's work in a day, yet might have spared his hands if he had only worked a little more with his head," were the kind of remarks now current about this simple laborious peasant who lacked knowledge and cuteness, who knew not the meaning of books, but knew the country round as none of his fellows did. So it came to pass that he died worked out, having lived long years on such lean fare as "hunger and a herring" can provide, dying, aged, yet prematurely, at seventy on the last day of May, while not far off is a veteran of ninety who gets about his garden briskly and looks younger than he has done, I reckon, these last ten years. There was no kind of field and farm labour for which he had not been requisitioned at some time or other, though in these days of advanced civilisation, with all the accomplishments of the office and the shop, with all our flat luxury and ephemeral journalism, it is natural that little account is taken of the primitive arts of hedging and ditching, ploughing and harvesting, thatching and faggoting, minding a horse, or doctoring a sick cow. I remember hearing how Debney had sat up all one bitter winter's night with his master's Alderney, which was suffering from fever, how he had tied clouts of sacking and carpet round her body to keep out the piercing chill, and then, as he afterwards told in his simple way, how, having exhausted his skill as a nurse and doctor, he had knelt in the straw at his patient's side and "carr'd the keow in prayer to the Lord," and the Lord heard the prayer of the hind by the manger and answered it. And it was all for another man's cow.

He drove his pony and cart every Saturday into market thirteen miles away, carrying vegetables and such other country produce as he could collect, and thus he fought and barely won his long, stern fight for freedom from the workhouse. It doubtless cost him years of life, both he and his children showing by their physical frailty what they had lacked to eat. But he gained the honour of the situation.

We halted outside the churchyard wall. The day was far advanced, and the sun was behind the tree-tops. The vicar had been called away on duty into town and was unable to get back sooner. Now the sexton came and tolled the bell, the coffin was taken out of the cart and carried into the church. Psalm xc. was read and the fifteenth chapter of Corinthians. "Thou sayest Return." "We spend our years . . . threescore years and ten . . . in the morning like grass which groweth up . . . in the evening it is cut down and withereth" . . . Still, "let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us, and establish Thou the work of our hands." We are out again in the sunshine, the minister leading the way down the bank on which stands the grey church with its silent history of years from the day when the profane Norman king stabled his horse in the chancel and next day fell a victim to a fateful arrow. The bearers raise the coffin of plain, unpolished elm board, beautiful with its twisted grain, the runic characters recording the story of the life of the tree. Just a simple cradle with wreaths of flowers on it. Not the exasperating waxy convention, the white hot-house wreath at ten-and-six, but the bloom of cottage gardens woven together by unskilled fingers—heart's-ease, now a columbine and forget-me-not, red daisies and guelder-rose, honeysuckle, pink cottage roses, London pride, and star o' Bethlehem to guide the countryman to the King. Three bowed grey heads, a stalwart man of fifty, and a youth stood at the grave-side during the committal, and a glory of golden light flowed over this place of peace. It was at the foot of the bank sloping towards the sunrise. There was no undertaker, no taint of trade about this duty. Only the brotherly hands of neighbours rendered this willing service of laying man's spent frame in the fragrant earth from which the flowers above were drawing their sweet basic odours. This, I felt, was the right way to bring a man's body home at the last. Thus real life ends with reality. Too seldom do we exhibit such a demeanour of sincerity and simplicity. Too often do we alternate in the last act between irrelevant display and heartless mechanism. A poor friendless soul dies in the workhouse. Four more perfunctory old paupers, too weak to carry him, are told off to wheel him to his grave. At the opposite pole the barbaric display of a rich man's obsequies. Truly pompa mortis magis terret quam mors ipsa. Or we get up a military funeral for some colonel of volunteers, and the stage-play is considered "very effective."

On the other hand, this scene in a country churchyard was not "effective." There was no notion of effect from first to last. It was unaffected, true, sublime. It was scarcely sad, it was so right and rightly done. It seemed the plain human endorsement of God's holy arrest in its place in the order of nature and boundless life.

But for us, in this woodland "God's Acre," the service was over. Two by two the artless mourners returned by the way they had come, through the forest and over the green, the pony and empty cart following. A living sermon had been preached—the sermon of a lifetime—on the text "Work while it is day." A rude rendering, doubtless, yet sound doctrine of unstained sincerity and unsophisticated faithfulness. And now, from earth and air and sky, from bird and flower, from stately trees, and setting sun, from the ancient hallowed words of the fathers of our faith and from living love and living sorrow had come to this simple, toilworn soul the benediction "Peace."

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The annual meeting of this Association was held in the Central Hall, Belfast, on the 10th inst. Mr. James Davidson (Windsor) presided, and there was a large attendance.

The Rev. J. A. Kelly (hon. secretary) read the twenty-ninth annual report, which said that the Committee had done their best with the means at their disposal to discharge the duties laid upon them, and referred to the literature with which the depository had been supplied. Literature expository of Unitarian Christianity would be sent free of charge for distribution, and it was suggested that someone in each congregation should be appointed to receive it. During the past year financial help had been received from the Irish Unitarian Society, and some new subscribers had been enrolled. Reference was also made in the report to "Dr. Torrey's gross attack on the moral character of Unitarians generally," and to the tracts written by Rev. A. N Blatchford, of Bristol in reply to Dr. Torrey. In conclusion, the report dealt with the loss by death of old and tried friends, viz., Mr. Samuel Riddel, of Beechmount; Mr. Hugh Bailie, of Larne; and Mr. F. D. Ward, J.P., of Belfast, all of whom were original members of the Association; also Miss Callwell, of Larne, who till her death was the local treasurer in that congregation. The committee strongly commended the Association to the earnest and increased support of its friends. On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by Rev. Joseph Worthington, the report and treasurer's accounts were adopted.

The Rev. Principal Gordon, M.A., in seconding a resolution of renewed adhesion to the principles and objects of the Association, said the principles of that Association had been well set out in the report. Unitarians stood, among other things—and this was a prominent thing—for the reasonable use of the Bible. People were now turning to the Bible with an enhanced interest, largely on account of the attack known as the higher criticism. Unitarians, however, were not much affected by it. The principles upon which it proceeded were principles with which they were perfectly familiar, and it was only the application of them on particular occasions which need cause Unitarians any special examination and research. They looked to the Bible not for physical legislation, nor for rigid, dogmatic finality, but for principles which were to affect the conduct, to raise up character, to have moral influence, and to inculcate religious ideas, and the fact that these principles were not given to them in the Bible in purely dry, abstract form, but came out in illuminating form of parable, far from detracting from their fitness, only made them more real, more human, and more applicable to the needs of each succeeding age. The Rev. Charles Peach was subsequently thanked for his services on behalf of the Association, and, the old committee having been re-elected, a vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, and the meeting concluded with praise and prayer.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

Sir,—I shall be glad if you will allow me, through The Inquirer, to inform friends interested in this movement that after due consideration the committee have decided to suspend this work, at all events for a time.

Space will not allow me to explain in detail the reasons for this action, but shortly they are as follows:—

The children attending our Sunday-schools share the privileges provided by the Central Holiday Fund in the same manner as others attending the Board schools. The disability which certainly existed when our sectional movement was started no longer remains. The two agencies overlap and compete with one another, a mischief to be avoided, and our organisation is naturally not so efficient as that of the larger society. Further, many parents have been educated by our work, and prefer placing out their children themselves in country houses of their own choice.

The committee are deciding that superintendents should watch the working of the holiday movement in so far as it affects the scholars attending their schools, and that they should report to the secretary at the end of the summer as to whether the action taken by the committee has been prejudicial to the interests of the children.

I am requested by the committee, and more especially by the late treasurer of the movement, Miss A. J. Lawrence, to thank the contributors who have enabled the society for so many years to carry on this useful work, and to ask them, in the event of it being decided to take it up again, for the renewal of their kind support.

In the meantime, may I draw the attention of our friends to a similar effort made to provide an inexpensive holiday for scholars (above 13) and teachers at the Southend Holiday Home. The home last year received 119 visitors. If, however, it is to be kept open, it will be necessary to increase the subscription list, as last year the treasurer was left with a deficit of £25. Contributions may be sent to me or to the treasurer, Mr. Ion Pritchard, at Essex Hall.

UNITARIAN LITERATURE WANTED.

Sir,—I trust that your readers have already heard of the establishment here within the past year of a theological school designed to train men for the ministry of the Unitarian Churches on the Pacific Coast, where we were lately so pleased to be visited by your Mr. Hargrove; and they will doubtless be glad to know that its first year has been a most encouraging one, and that its prospects for the future are bright. The library of the School has already had generous gifts of books, not only from American friends, but from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and from the Sunday-school Association. I wish to make the library strong in all that will illustrate the history of Unitarianism in either hemisphere, and to that end am anxious to obtain the works of all early English Unitarians from Biddle down, as well as of those attacking Unitarianism; the collected works of the Polish Brethren; and sets of as many as possible of the English Unitarian periodicals, especially the Christian Teacher, Prospective Review, National Review, Theological Review, Inquirer, Christian Life, and Unitarian Herald. If any of your readers have any of the above, either in complete sets or in separate volumes or numbers, and would like to bestow them where they will be sure to be of service to generations of students to come, I should be glad to have them address me.—Yours, &c.,

Earl Morse Wilbur,
Dean of the School.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Leeds: Hunslet.—The bazaar held here on 6th and 8th inst. was a great success. It was opened on the first day by Mrs. A. Currer Brigg, ex-Lady Mayoress of Leeds, and on the second day by Mr. Simeon Hall, also of Leeds. There was a good attendance on both days, and the receipts amounted to the record sum of £135.

Maidstone.—On Wednesday, April 12, the annual congregational meeting was held. Mr. A. J. Ellis occupied the chair, and in moving the adoption of the reports said that there was evidence in them of much good work having been done during the past year. They had their difficulties, but he felt sure they would be surmounted. The chapel report referred to the resignation of their minister. They had had excellent discourses from Mr. Brettell, the congregation and minister had worked well together, and they would part with him with sincere regret. The visitor of the evening was the Rev. J. T. Davis, B.A., of Chatham, who gave an able and stimulating address, which was highly appreciated. The Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., thanked the chairman and others for their kindly reference to him, and spoke of his great indebtedness to the workers who carried on the institutions connected with the chapel. A hopeful feeling pervaded the meeting throughout.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversazione was held at Gorton on Saturday last, and was attended by about 230 teachers and friends. After tea a meeting of the committee was held, followed by a general assembly in the large school. An excellent musical and dramatic entertainment was given by the Gorton friends, including several musical action songs by the children, which were received in a most enthusiastic manner. The chair was occupied by Rev. G. Evans, M.A., supported by Mr. A. Slater and the delegates from kindred unions, Rev. G. Smith, and Mr. J. H. Pimley, both of whom delivered a brief appropriate address during the evening. At the close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to all on the motion of Rev. H. B. Smith, seconded by Rev. W. F. Turland.

Shirebrook, near Mansfield.—The following report reaches us; we understand the movement has the support of our local friends:—"Shirebrook Unitarians have hitherto conducted their meetings in a cottage. They have now determined to secure more suitable premises, and are arranging to occupy a hall lately used by the Congregationalists. At their annual meeting, held March 15, Mr. J. Davies Thomas presided over a good gathering. After partaking of a tea, hospitably provided by Mr. and Mrs. Chadbourne, the treasurer read his accounts, showing a balance of £9 10s.; Mr. Thomas was elected president; Mr. T. Chadbourne, Sookholme-road, Shirebrook, treasurer, and Mr. W. Smith, 56, Vernon-street, Shirebrook, secretary. It was determined to start a Sunday-school, and to institute week-day meetings. The members all desired to become more identified with the Unitarian Association, and to include their institution among the list of congregations. The officers were authorised to appeal for financial help, to furnish their new home, the members pledging themselves to do all in their power to place the church on a stronger basis. The hymnal in use at present was condemned, owing to the theological taint of many of the hymns, but the matter was left over owing to want of funds. The business being concluded, a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. and Mrs. Chadbourne for their hospitality." A strong appeal is made to all friends of Liberal Christianity to assist this struggling church in its aim to hold up the flag of Unitarians in Shirebrook. The first service took place on Sunday, April 2. Mr. J. Davies Thomas preached to a numerous assembly. At the close of the service Mr. J. Harrop White, president of the North Midland Association spoke a few words of encouragement.

As we go to press a day earlier than usual this week it has been difficult to compass all the church news, and we have a considerable amount of matter that must stand over.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE is no human life so poor and small as not to hold many a divine possibility—its "angel that always beholds the face of the Father who is in heaven." And this is enough to make tenderness and reverence nearer to truth than any suggestion of suspicion or impulse of contempt.—Martineau.

THE Norwich celebration of the Martineau Centenary is reported in our present issue. Next week we shall have to record the further celebration at Manchester College, Oxford. At Norwich the Easter weather was somewhat uncertain and chilly, but the rain came at considerate moments, and could not spoil the pleasure of any of the gatherings. The sunniest time was happily just when sunshine was most welcome, on Saturday afternoon in the Bracondale Woods and at Carrow Abbey, where it came, as if to vie with the genial welcome extended by Mr. Russell Colman and Dr. and Mrs. Stuart to their guests. There was no opportunity for any collective word of gratitude to them from the party they so kindly entertained, but we may be permitted to record here that it was warmly felt.

THE days at Norwich, as we have noted elsewhere, have left the happiest memories. Nothing could have exceeded the careful forethought with which the days' celebrations and pleasures were planned by the members of the Octagon congregation, and the efficiency with which all was carried out. We trust that our Norwich friends have as pleasant a sense of satisfaction in what they accomplished, as we have warm gratitude for what they did for us. To Mrs. Mottram, the bright intrepid spirit of the Memorial Committee, to Mr. A. M. Stevens, the indefatigable secretary, to the Rev. Alfred Hall, the devoted minister of the Octagon congregation, to Mr. Mottram, Mr. Scott, Mr. King, and many others, the visitors would have been glad to express in some public way their special thanks; but as no opportunity offered, we are asked here, on their behalf, to give this assurance to our Norwich friends, and to add a special word of thanks from the members of Dr. Martineau's family, who felt very deeply the manifestations of reverence and admiration and affection which characterised the celebrations, and the great kindness shown to them personally.

THE working of the new constitution of the Congregational Union is already giving rise to animated discussions, which will prove interesting to students of democratic government, whether it be in the sphere of religion or politics. The burden of the Union has got to be borne by the Council and its committees, and it is becoming evident that the work will prove too heavy for honorary officers to discharge. Should there be a paid chairman, say a trusted and leading minister, who can be induced to give up his pastoral office? No, says Mr. Carvell Williams, but you need an additional paid secretary. The name of the office seems immaterial. But some increase of what hostile critics would call bureaucracy appears to be inevitable. The reason is clear. Democracy in government means extended rule, more responsibility, more detail. A parallel case is found in the Municipalities where the work is rapidly becoming too big and too complicated for a casual honorary mayor to control, and we are constantly meeting with arguments in favour of the professional mayor elected for an extended term of office. To return to the Congregationalists. Mr. Williams says that the "list of duties assigned to the Council is almost appalling in its magnitude"; but we are among those sanguine persons who confidently expect our neighbours to prove able to get these duties effectively discharged. The frank discussion of difficulties is a good way to overcoming them.

THE Agricultural Co-operative Credit Societies, which play a considerable part in the economy of some European countries, have only enjoyed a moderate success in the British Isles. But during the few years during which they have been in operation they are found to have supplied a distinct want, as is shown by their rapid increase. The figures in the Labour Gazette give only thirty-one societies in 1898, a number which by 1903 had grown to 150. The increase of membership is not quite so rapid, but the members for 1903 were 10,509. It is of the essence of the scheme for the societies to be small enough for the members to have knowledge of one another. Loans are made to members, but only for reproductive purposes, such as the purchase of live stock or farm implements. The majority of the societies are in Ireland, where they have been assisted by loans from the Congested District Board. And it is worth recording that as yet no bad debts have been incurred.

THE Rev. J. L. Haigh, of 89, Aubrey Street, Liverpool, has some copies of his dream-story, "A Night with Jesus," to spare, and these he will be glad to send to postal missions or any other societies or individuals, who may find them of service in connection with the prevalent "revival" excitement.

FRIENDS of the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel will have noticed that no report of the recent annual meeting has appeared in these columns. That has been from no evil intent, or lack of the sincerest interest in the work. We hope soon to make some amends by publishing a special article on the work of the Mission.

THE annual meeting of the North Midland Sunday-school Association was held at Upperthorpe Chapel, Sheffield, on Easter Monday, when an encouraging report of the work of the schools was presented. The Rev. E. I. Fripp was elected president, and the Rev. E. G. Evans, of Chesterfield, secretary. In the afternoon service was conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, from Romans i. 16, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." After tea a paper was read by the Rev. J. J. Wright on "The permanent element in Sunday-school work," which he defined as the teaching of the art of right living.

SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

Annual Meeting.

The annual meetings were held at the West Grove Unitarian Church, Cardiff, on Monday, April 17, the President, Rev. W. J. Phillips, in the chair. The constituent congregations were well represented, and both to the meeting of the committee in the morning, and to the annual meeting after lunch, satisfactory reports of the year's work were presented.

Large grants are received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the need of more local support of the work was recognised. The experiment of re-opening the Bridgend Chapel, after two years, showed hopeful signs, and the work at Pontypridd had been much strengthened by the advent of the Rev. Simon Jones. It was hoped that before long an appointment would be made to the vacant pulpit of Highland Place, Aberdare.

A movement is on foot with a view to establishing Unitarian services at Newport. A local friend having called the attention of the Central Association in London to the fact that no Unitarian church or meeting house existed in the town, though containing over 70,000 inhabitants, the subject was discussed at the committee meeting, and it was decided first of all to enlist the sympathy of known Unitarians in Newport, and through the public press invite the co-operation of others interested in broad views of religion who feel themselves out of touch with popular "orthodoxy." A letter of application for affiliation with the Society was received from the Dowlais congregation, signed by the minister and leading members of the church. The application was cordially acceded to.

The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bolton. The Rev. Simon Jones, of Pontypridd, conducted the devotional service.

A resolution of hearty thanks was accorded to Mr. L. N. Williams for his eminent services, both as treasurer of the society and for his services as secretary in past years. In relinquishing the office of treasurer, Mr. Williams is making room for his son, Mr. Ernest Williams.

The President welcomed the Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, among them that day, both on his own account and as the representative of the B. & F.U.A. Mr. Lloyd, in an interesting speech, which was full of encouragement, acknowledged the welcome.

A public meeting of a more than usually interesting character was held in the evening, which took the form of celebrating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Dr. Martineau. The Rev. W. J. Phillips, President of the Society, occupied the chair, and in a speech which set the right keynote for the occasion, introduced the speakers. The Rev. W. Tudor Jones delivered a fine appreciation of Martineau's works, mentioning more especially the "Seat of Authority in Religion," and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, an old pupil of Martineau, read a paper of affectionate tribute to his old master. He was followed by the Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, who delivered a discriminating review of Martineau's work as a philosopher and religious teacher. The last speaker was the Rev. J. H. Weatherall.

The Cardiff congregation worthily maintained their reputation for generous hospitality, entertaining the delegates both to luncheon and tea.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of subscribers and friends was held at the Mission, Mill-street, on Tuesday evening, April 18, the President, Mr. Richard D. Holt, J.P., in the chair.

The Committee's annual report, submitted by the honorary secretary (Mr. Harold Coventry), referred with satisfaction to the progress of the work, but deplored the want of Sunday-school teachers. Mention was made of the visit of the Lord Mayor to the evening service at the Mission on February 5, when the Rev. L. P. Jacks preached. A feeling reference was made to the very great loss sustained in the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, a past President of the Society, and during his twenty years' residence in Liverpool a warm friend and faithful member of Committee.

The treasurer's statement of accounts, read by the deputy treasurer (Mr. Forwood Heyn), showed a debit balance, as usual.

The report and statement of accounts having been adopted, the Rev. H. D. Roberts moved a vote of sympathy with the missionaries, which was seconded by Mr. Arthur W. Hall, and supported by Alderman W. B. Bowring. Mr. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Anderton responded.

Mr. Tom Cook was elected president, and the committee appointed for the ensuing year on the motion of Mr. Joseph Coventry, seconded by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes.

The meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman, on the motion of the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, seconded by Mr. Fred Bowring.

Among those present were the Rev. J. Morley Mills, Rev. Chas. and Mrs. Craddock, Rev. J. L. Haigh, Miss Bowring, Mr. and Mrs. F. Cook, Mr. and Mrs. F. Robinson, Mrs. J. P. Brunner, Councillor C. Brunner, Miss Coventry, Mrs. Mulleneux, Mr. W. Coventry, Mr. and Mr. Tom Cook, &c.

A letter was read from Mr. Charles W. Jones, regretting his inability to be present.

THE YEAR 1903.

We are indebted to a correspondent for the following notes on the report of the Registrar-General for England and Wales for the year 1903 recently issued :—

The year will be remembered as the wettest on record; but it was not an unhealthy year, indeed the death rate was the lowest on record, being only 15·4 per 1,000. The birth rate is said to have been the lowest on record, but it was 28·4 per 1,000, which is higher than some foreign countries and most of our colonies, the lowest rate of all being that of France which stood at 21·1. The marriage rate is given as showing 15·6 persons married per 1,000 of the population, being slightly in excess of the death rate. The total number of marriages was 261,103. This is fewer than in 1902, when there were 261,750, and 1899, when there were 262,334, but more than in any other year. The number of church marriages was 170,044, being fewer than in any year since 1896, but more than in that year or any previous year. The permillage of church marriages was also the lowest on record, being 651 per 1,000, a drop of 10 from the figure of 1902, and a drop of 34 from the figure of 1898. The tide, which has flowed away from the church since registration commenced, appears to be setting stronger than ever.

Of non-church marriages 10,621, or 41 per 1,000, were Roman Catholic marriages. This number is smaller than in 1901 and 1899, but greater than in any other year, the excess over 1902 being 15. During the last 12 years the permillage has 8 times been 41, 3 times 40, and once 42, namely, in 1894. It had previously been generally higher.

The Protestant Nonconformist and Quaker marriages were 34,024, being the greatest number in any year on record; and the permillage was also the greatest, namely 130 per 1,000. The Registrar attended at 26,538 of these, and 104 were Quaker marriages, the remaining 7,380 being registered by an authorised person under the recent Act of Parliament, that is to say (generally) by the minister.

Jewish marriages were 1,894 in number, 50 less than in 1902, but more than in any other year. These give a permillage of 7·3. Nearly three-quarters of these marriages, that is to say 1,386, took place in London, 261 in Lancashire, and 106 in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The civil marriages numbered 44,520, or 170 per 1,000, the greatest number and the greatest permillage ever recorded. The reduction of 10 per 1,000 in church marriages went as to 3 per 1,000 to Protestant Nonconformists, and 7 per 1,000 to the civil registry. It is noteworthy that the relation of church to non-church marriages, which 50 years ago stood at 840 to 160, stands now at 651 to 349.

Other tables in the report show that immature marriages are diminishing. In the period 1876-80 there were 77·8 per 1,000 of the bridegrooms under age, and 217 per 1,000 of the brides. These figures have steadily fallen since that date, and stood in 1903 at 45·7 per 1,000 bridegrooms, and 152·3 per 1,000 brides.

The permillage of illiterates, which has diminished very rapidly of late years, under the influence of the Education Act, stood lower than ever in 1903. Only 19·3 per 1,000 husbands signed by mark, and 23·2 per 1,000 wives. Even these numbers are, to a considerable extent, made up of foreign Jews and other foreigners who are married in the East-End of London. The whole of London showed a permillage of 22 illiterate husbands and 31 wives; but, if the foreign quarter be omitted, the rest of London gives only 9 illiterate husbands and 12 illiterate wives in 1,000 marriages.

"THE UNITY OF THE SPIRIT."

A SERMON IN MEMORY OF DR. MARTINEAU.

By the Rev. James Drummond, LL.D., D.Litt.*

"Till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."—Ephesians iv. 13.

About 1875 years ago, in a far distant land, an obscure tragedy was enacted which was intended to put an ignominious end to a troublesome religious agitation. It was hoped by the responsible leaders of the nation that when they had handed over to the death of a slave the unauthorised teacher from Galilee, whose stinging rebukes of those in power, together with his high enthusiasm, had won the plaudits of the multitude, the whole movement which he had started would collapse as a manifest fraud. Alas! for the blindness of human sagacity. That tragedy left an ineffaceable impression on the world; and, after the lapse of so many centuries, this day, in each returning year, reminds us of that great victim of religious bigotry. Truly the men who crucified Christ knew not what they did, and never dreamt that from the cross would go forth a new ideal of life, and a magnetic power drawing the veneration of mankind. That which in prospect looked like the blackest stigma of infamy has become in retrospect the radiant symbol of triumphant faith and immortal love. We need not speculate whether without the crucifixion Christ would equally have drawn to himself the hearts of men; certain it is that that was the appointed means whereby his spirit of life, released from all earthly limitations, went forth on its victorious career, and attracted to itself the adoring love of saints and martyrs. Explain it as we may, the ideal of divine sonship is associated inseparably with the name of Christ, and has become our imperishable possession. Since the days of Paul the loftiest souls have yearned with him to attain to a perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

Among those who have most clearly perceived and most devoutly honoured that ideal, and have spent their whole lives in the spirit of consecrated duty, one of the noblest and most faithful was the man whose birth we have met together to commemorate. At the dedication of this chapel on May 12, 1756, Dr. John Taylor said, "This place will be the nursery of good and valuable persons." It was a true prophecy; and of the many "good and valuable persons" who have worshipped here none have been more distinguished than James Martineau and his sister Harriet. How far the workings of genius are influenced by external events it is difficult to estimate. The thoughts of both brother and sister went with irrepressible energy upon their own course and ultimately took widely divergent paths; but you are entitled to remember that here, in closest sympathy with one another, they offered their young worship, and here they imbibed those early religious ideas from which their own strong and original reflection took its start. And if the forms of their thought moved far away from the lessons which prevailed a century ago, still the first few years of life must leave some traces which can never be effaced, and the brother and sister surely owed, perhaps in a very large degree, to the associations of this place the independence, the courage, the sincerity of mind by which both alike were characterised.

It is not necessary that I should dwell at any length on the life of Dr. Martineau. Intending to become an engineer, he was driven by a strong religious impulse to change his purpose, and entered Manchester New College, at that time in York, in order to prepare himself for the Christian ministry. From that time to the close of his long life he never lost his interest in the little Academy, of which he was to become the most distinguished professor, and whose traditions of sound scholarship and untrammelled thought commanded his fullest sympathy. After a short period as a teacher in Dr. Carpenter's school at Bristol, he settled in the ministry in Dublin. Impelled by conscientious motives to resign, he found a home in Liverpool, where he spent twenty-five memorable years of fruitful labour. In 1857 the duties of his professorship called him to London. For many years he combined with his professional labours those of a minister in Little Portland-street Chapel. In 1885 he retired from the Principalship of the college; but his intellectual activity remained for many years, and some of his most important works were given to the public during this advanced period of his life.

It will thus be seen that he spent his years amidst, and largely in the service of, the little group of congregations into which he was born. This might seem a small field for the exercise of a great and original mind, and it is perhaps not surprising that some who knew nothing of the history and principles of these congregations should have supposed that he was throwing his powers away and quitting the world's spacious field for the narrow confines of a paltry sect. When he was candidate for a chair of Philosophy in University College, London, I remember seeing, with great indignation, that one of his opponents quoted against him the lines which Goldsmith wrote upon Burke:—

> "Who, born for the universe, narrowed his mind,
> And to party gave up what was meant for mankind."

There was no man to whom these words were less applicable. He was one of the world-spirits, whose sympathies roamed far beyond the boundaries of any sect. His "soul was like a star, and dwelt apart." Living habitually amidst the grandeurs of a spiritual and eternal scene, pledged to no dogmatic creed, and owning no party obligations, he gave his allegiance to truth alone; and he remained in connection with that body of religious men among whom he was born because they alone made no attempt to tie down his soaring spirit to their traditional ways, but encouraged him to seek for himself the deep things of God, and to utter with no concealment or evasion all that the Divine voice might speak within his heart and conscience.

A mind of this compass and detachment, however, could not always satisfy those whose energies were devoted to more immediate ends than he contemplated; and though, when occasion required, he defended Unitarian doctrine with unrivalled splendour, he exposed himself to misunderstanding, and excited some hostility, by the originality of his thought and the freedom and earnestness of the criticisms which he passed on Unitarian ways. He feared our congregations were in danger of drifting from their inherited principle of subordinating the intellect to the spirit, and allowing devotion to droop under the heats of controversy. It would not be faithful to his memory if, among many other subjects which must engage our attention during these centenary proceedings, we did not dwell on those views of ecclesiastical polity in which he took the deepest interest during more than fifty years of his life; and if we truly honour his memory, we shall not indeed bind ourselves to accept all his conclusions—the last thing which he himself would have desired—but we shall consider one of his most settled and earnest convictions with a sincere desire to understand it, and weigh with care and respect the reasons by which it was supported. His views upon the basis of church fellowship were expressed with great completeness nearly half a century ago, in two letters addressed to the Rev. S. F. Macdonald, and entitled "The Unitarian Position" and "Church-life? or Sect-life?" These letters gravely misunderstood at the time, still deserve serious study; for Dr. Martineau never wavered in his adhesion to the convictions there explained and defended.

In recent times we have repeatedly read or heard of "Unitarian Churches." Towards the end of his life Dr. Martineau declared that he knew nothing here in England of any "Unitarian Church," and that, if there were such a thing, he could not belong to it. This did not mean that he had ceased to be a Unitarian, but that neither Unitarianism nor any other school of theology was the divinely appointed basis for the Christian Church. The prevailing assumption that a church must rest upon defined forms of intellectual thought appeared to him to be a ruinous departure from the original Christian ideal, and to have established in all the sects conditions of membership which were not those of Christ, and indeed reversed the principles of religious association which Christ most emphatically laid down. So little was this position at one time understood that, although Dr. Martineau was one of the acutest theologians of his time, with an intellect of singular keenness and precision, he was supposed to be a vague and cloudy thinker, who attached no importance to definite theological conceptions. It must surely be needless at the present day to dissipate this strange misunderstanding. No man insisted more strongly on the importance of clear convictions, and no man laboured more earnestly to attain them; but he perceived that the most definite and unquestioned forms of thought are liable to be transfigured with the progress of mankind, whereas the great spiritual characteristics of Christianity remain unharmed while systems of theology rise and disappear. In the words of St. Paul, knowledge passes away, but faith, hope and love abide.

The element of truth contained in the charge of vagueness is this, that if a Church does not lay down a sharply defined creed as the basis of its association, there must be a certain fringe of vagueness in the corporate expression of its thought; but this corporate vagueness is an essential condition of intellectual freedom, and therefore, instead of hindering, promotes definite, sincere, and progressive thought on the part of the individual. Minds left in this freedom, and, amid intellectual variations, swayed by the same great spiritual emotions, will, at any given time, have sufficient community of thought to render common worship possible, and it is only when one begins to impose his own particular thought upon another that dissensions arise, and ultimately separation becomes inevitable. Christians may differ widely from one another, regarding the metaphysics of Christ's person, and yet may equally love him, and equally revere his spirit as the divine law of life; and if the latter is alone essential for Christian fellowship, then the metaphysical questions ought to be fought out in the schools of theology, and not be inscribed as limiting conditions over the portals of the sanctuaries of religion. Men would, no doubt, still group themselves spontaneously along certain lines of thought; but these would often cross and intermingle, and no man would feel that he was guilty of any insincerity in retaining his own definite beliefs, and at the same time joining with others, from whose opinions he dissented, in worship which he found spiritual and helpful. Till we reach the fulness of Christ there will be certain great types of religious experience, with corresponding intellectual expression; but if these are not fenced off from one another by rigid barriers, they will tend to supply one another's need, and at last, when we have attained to the perfect man, will fuse together into one harmonious body, and exhibit in their completeness the rich contents of that universal spirit which dwelt in Christ, and works in the hearts of his true disciples wherever they may be found.

Another misunderstanding was that Dr. Martineau wished to build a Church, not on any positive faith, but on the mere absence of restraining limitations. To clear away this misunderstanding his own eloquent words may be quoted:—"No one more heartily despises than I do the proposal to raise a church upon the mere basis of 'Free Inquiry.' No one more deeply feels that the merging of self-will is the first act of all devout life and the indispensable condition of all Christian union. . . . There are, however, two ways of protesting against Individualism. You may do it by taking my hand and leading me back with you from the fretful foreground of human contention into the inner harmonies of Divine communion, where differences between soul and soul sincerely melt away, and there is no surrender of either to the other, but of both to God. Or, keeping to the dogmatic front of things, you may try to make me ashamed of my personal belief, offering me a retreat into your own 'individualism,' if I can find myself at home there; but prepared, if I cannot, to complain of mine, and moralise on the perversity of mankind. The latter is the way of party self-assertion, by which the gentler individualities are simply crushed beneath the stronger, and no one is lifted into any higher sphere. The former seems to me the way of God's own spirit, by which He draws us out of our notional conceits into a living fellowship. I believe in no blending power but this. Religious union is not brought about, like a railway pacification, by competitive triumphs or negotiated compromise, but by the spontaneous relapse of divergent thoughts upon some point of all-absorbing piety." In accordance with this view he gave the following definition of a church:—"Christianity is a Divine dispensation for bringing men into conscious union with the Holiest of all, with the Father through the Son: a church is an institution embodying and applying the distinctively Christian requisites to this end—the dying away to sin and self, and the rising into strength, goodness, and love by filial surrender to the Perfect Will."

He was led to a clear perception of the principles thus enunciated through studying the history of our congregations in connection with the Lady Hewley case and the Dissenters' Chapels Act. These congregations had passed gradually through a complete theological revolution without any loss of spiritual identity; and not only so, but provision for the possibility of this change had been deliberately made by placing the churches on purely spiritual foundations, and by clearly recognising a universal Christianity which found a home amid all the discordant sects. It is sometimes hinted by those whose wish must be father to the thought that our forerunners only blundered into their free position, and had no conscious hold of the principle to which Dr. Martineau attached so much importance. But so far as this venerable chapel is concerned there is no room for doubt. In dedicating it as a place of public worship nearly a century and a half ago Dr. Taylor spoke with all plainness, and I venture to ask your attention to the following remarkable passage:—"We are Christians, and only Christians; a name which, in its original and true meaning, includes all that is virtuous and amiable, just and good, noble and Divine, excellent and heavenly . . . Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, Calvinists, Arminians, Arians, Trinitarians, and others, are names of religious distinctions. But, however we may commonly be ranked under any of these divisions, we reject them all. We disown all connection, except that of love and goodwill, with any sect or party whatsoever. . . . And we consider all our fellow-protestants of every denomination in the same light; only as Christians, and cordially embrace them all in affection and charity as such. Whatever peculiar tenets they may hold, or in what respects soever they may differ from us, such tenets and such difference we consider not as affecting their Christian character and profession in general. Notwithstanding such peculiarities, we allow they may be good Christians, and as good Christians as ourselves. . . . From the Church of England we do indeed dissent; but not as enemies, seeking her destruction, but as real friends, wishing her most perfect establishment and prosperity. . . . As we judge all other men to be fallible and liable to mistake, so we pass the very same judgment upon ourselves. . . . We advise and exhort every person to the free and sincere use of his own understanding and judgment, as the only way in which he can approve himself to God, and gain the acceptance of his religious endeavours. And in this way, though he may not agree with us in disputable points, we own and receive him as acceptable to God, and entitled to our religious fellowship. . . . To unity of knowledge and sentiments we cannot attain, under the unavoidable imperfections of our nature; nor, for the same reason, can we possibly, by a free and universal consent, establish uniformity of worship among all Christians. But though we cannot unite in opinions or modes of worship, we may very amicably agree, and be sufficiently united in spirit, in love or charity, which is the very highest degree of perfection to which religion can be raised here below. . . . Love and friendly affections, candour and mutual forebearance are the strong cement which connects Christians into one happy body; the balm which heals every wound; the fragrant perfume, which, so far as it is diffused, renders society very pleasing and delightful; the genial dew of heaven, which cools immoderate heats, sweetly refreshes life, and promotes our spiritual growth, by dilating the heart to universal goodness and benevolence, by opening the understanding, and giving freedom of mind to admit the truth wherever we find it. . . . . This edifice is founded upon no party principles or tenets, but is built on purpose, and with this very design, to keep ourselves clear from them all; to discharge ourselves from all the prejudices and fetters in which any of them may be held; that so we may exercise the public duties of religion upon the most catholic and charitable foundation, according to the rules and spirit of genuine Christianity, as taught and established by our Lord and his inspired Apostles. . . . This is our present sense and spirit, and I hope it will always be so."

Dr. Martineau himself could not be more explicit; and it may be that in his early years, as he worshipped within these walls, though he could not yet understand all that was involved, this spirit of devout freedom and large communion hovered around him, and sought and found a congenial home in that young heart which was afterwards to beat with such high enthusiasm for the eternal sanctities of Christian life and fellowship.

That this traditional policy of our congregations represented the true basis of religious communion was a conviction which his own experience confirmed. Not only in philosophy, but in theology, he wandered far away from the opinions of his childhood and youth; and the change was not limited to subordinate details of doctrine, but affected the very foundations of belief. And yet through all changes he remained the same spiritual man, and the deep and hidden forces of the Divine life within him only found fuller and finer expression as his intellect expanded and new stores of knowledge were acquired. He became aware also that even amid identical doctrines the stress was laid now on one and now on another, so that none could be singled out as permanently and truly representing the essential characteristics of religious thought. And, further, in the wide range of his reading he found that his religious sympathies were by no means confined within the limits of his doctrinal belief, but that sometimes amid intellectual agreement there was spiritual repulsion, and amid the widest diversity of creed there was spiritual attraction. Thus he became the earnest advocate of doctrinal openness in all ecclesiastical arrangements. The thought of the individual could not be too definite or his declaration of it too frank and fearless, and at any given time a certain undefined amount of theological agreement was necessary to render possible sincere worship in common; but nevertheless men were divided from one another by changeable opinions, and could be fused together into a religious body only through the sacred power of a Divine life, filling all alike with the same holy affections, and committing all to the same path of consecrated duty. It was, he felt, these great ideas, these heavenward aspirations, which lifted men above the narrowing influence of party, and constituted the only power which could restore the unity of Christendom. The Christian church has been shattered into fragments by the attempts of fallible men to secure dogmatic unity; if it is ever to be re-united it must pass below the superficial controversies of opinion, and reach the deep heart of love, the hidden life of the Son of God within the soul. How many at the present day are hungering and thirsting for that blessed life, and longing to escape from the strife of tongues and the uncertainty of dogma into the serenity of worship and the peace of a boundless trust and hope. Are we prepared to point the way to the unity of the Spirit, and, refusing all sectarian methods, to summon men to an all-embracing Christianity, where the sons of God worship in spirit and in truth?

It was thus that Dr. Martineau sought to lead men towards the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God. To be Christ-like, doing the will of God, listening in reverent and obedient love to the Divine voice within—this is the essential thing. We dare not say that even our greatest have reached the goal of Christian aspiration, the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; but this one thing we may say of our departed friend and teacher, that he sought, not indeed through modern self-realisation to become a perfect man, but through Christian self-forgetfulness to do a perfect work. It is only through this way of the cross that perfection is attained. We are here not for our own sakes, in order to become this or that, but to do the will of God, and to finish the work which He assigns to each. It was in this spirit that Dr. Martineau fulfilled his course; and the example of devout faithfulness and of the strenuous use, for high and unselfish ends, of splendid and varied powers, is the holiest benediction which he has left us. May that Holy Spirit which abode in him abide in us also, and keep us faithful and pure to the end!

FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL AND HOME.

Two new publications of the Sunday School Association's are to be warmly commended to our teachers in school and home. The cost of each is 1s.

Scenes and Stories from the Life of Jesus. Twelve lessons on separate cards, illustrated by twelve pictures of scenes in Palestine,—arranged by the Rev. T. P. Spedding. An additional card furnishes some introductory notes, and the whole twenty-five are enclosed in a durable envelope. The size is 6½ in. by 5½ in., and the pictures, though, from some defect in the plates or other cause, not very clearly printed, are attractive in subject, and quite sufficient for class purposes. There are pictures of Nazareth and Bethany and the Via Dolorosa at Jerusalem, views of the Sea of Galilee, the River Jordan, the desolate Jericho road, and the Garden of Gethsemane, and pictures representing bread-making, drawers of water, and the shepherd. The companion cards are not to be used for reading in class, but as illustrations for the teacher preparing the lessons. The references are chiefly to three well-known and easily available books, issued by the Association (each of these also costs a shilling), Mr. Gannett's "Childhood of Jesus," Mr. Carpenter's "Life in Palestine when Jesus Lived," and Miss Gillies' "Lessons in Religion." Extra copies of the pictures may be had at the rate of 3d. a dozen. Mr. Spedding's notes will be found admirable in design, furnishing material for a series of really helpful lessons. Boyhood, Baptism, the Calling of the Disciples, with lessons on the occupations of the people, and the story of the Good Samaritan, lead on to Gethsemane, and the death of Jesus, ending on the note of grateful love and discipleship. "The Master's teachings," Mr. Spedding says in his introduction, "are only incidentally alluded to, the desire being to give the scholars an idea of the land in which he lived, the people among whom he moved, some of the occupations in which they were engaged, and to suggest how different were his surroundings and the conditions of his life from our own. If we could realise this difference more clearly we should be better able to understand, and to sympathise with, his teachings."

The other publication is a Portable Blackboard. In appearance it is like a good-sized folding chessboard, the size when open being rather more than 16 in. by 12 in. Inside, the board is lined with smooth black paper, specially prepared for use with chalks and a dry duster, and two stiffened leaves are also bound into the board, so that it forms a book with six available pages, or when open three surfaces of the above-noted size. For use in small classes or with the children at home, where a large blackboard is not available, it will be found of great practical use. And there is this special advantage that a teacher can prepare, if he likes, a series of illustrative drawings at home and then shut up the book and carry it with him to school. Better still, of course, for those who have the ready gift, is to let the children see the drawings grow. Those who have been present at the Rev. Thomas Robinson's lecture know how much that means. SHORT NOTICES.

The Spirit Christlike. By Charles S. Macfarland.—The meditations in this volume are characterised by much fine feeling and insight, by much, indeed, of the spirit which they seek to interpret and inculcate. The author, who is an American Congregational minister, evidently belongs to the mystics of the world, without whom, as he truly says, "the actors would have no motive," and doubtless many readers will find in his pages the kind of inspiration and helpful teaching they want. He pleads in "the almost forgotten name of prayer" and in the name of other things which nourish a true strong life within the soul. He believes that the answer of religion—the answer of faith and hope and love—is the only final answer to life's deepest questions. It is seldom that he enters the sphere of controversial theology, and the main article of his creed seems to be expressed in a saying which is several times repeated throughout the volume:—"In Christ, God became partaker of the life of men, that men might be partakers in the life of God." (Boston: The Pilgrim Press. London: James Clarke & Co.)

The Training of the Twig (Religious Education of Children), by the Rev. C. L. Drawbridge, M.A., of Hampstead, is a book of sixty-four brief and pointed chapters (not quite 200 pages) which will be found helpful and stimulating by the parents and teachers to whom it is addressed. The main thoughts to be impressed are rendered prominent by large type, and brief but pointed anecdote is effectively used. "Telling is not Teaching" is the subject of one chapter, and the next is "Co-operation." Then comes a chapter on Restlessness, which is "energy run to waste," and the conclusion is "useful employment, rather than unjust punishment, is the scientific remedy for misapplied activity." In a later chapter on "How to ensure a spirit of order" these are the points emphasised: "Appeal to the best motives of your pupils. Love the children, and thus win their affection. Deserve respect, and thus secure it. Expect to be obeyed. Set a good example. Be cheerful and good humoured." Each point as it arises is enlarged upon in the course of the chapter. The opening of the next chapter, on "How to Quell Disorder," is Nip it in the bud, and the conclusion, "Skill in the art of government, not hostility to the governed, is what is required." These brief notes are sufficient to show that the book is well worth attention. (Longmans, 3s. net.)

We have also received the following publications:—

A second and revised edition of Dante's Ten Heavens: A Study of the Paradiso, by Edmund G. Gardner, M.A. (Constable, 5s. net.)

Principles of Physiological Psychology, by W. Wundt. Translated by E. B. Titchener. Vol. I. (Sonnenschen.)

The Fight with France for North America, by A. G. Bradley, author of "Canada in the Twentieth Century," "Wolfe," &c., with maps and a number of interesting old portraits and other illustrations. (Constable, 3s. 6d. net.)

Cities of India, by G. W. Forrest, C.I.E., ex-Director of Records, Government of India, with illustrations. A popular edition. (Constable, 5s. net.)

OBITUARY.

THE REV. PETER DEAN.

"Here was no sudden interruption of a brief career, but the quiet rounding of a finished life. He was a veteran whose arms had been dented in many a stern campaign, and now, having worn himself out in the Great Commander's service, he had received the reward of rest, the gift of sleep, followed, as they believed, by the awakening summons to a higher world. For him life was real and life was earnest. He would probably have been living to-day had he thought more of himself and less of duty and of God. To the call of humanity he gave away the last ounce of his strength. Many causes claimed him, and what to him were the commandments of God were exceedingly broad, and the functions of a minister of God had a social as well as a personal application. He offered himself as testimony of everything that was progressive in politics. He laboured for the uplifting of the masses of men."

So said the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas at the funeral service of the Rev. Peter Dean, whose death at Loughborough, on Monday, April 17, we recorded last week.

Peter Dean was a native of Blackburn, where he was born Dec. 30, 1840. He was therefore only sixty-four at the time of his death. As a young man he was a working journalist, connected first with the Blackburn Times, and afterwards with the Bury Times, but strong sympathies and reforming zeal led him to throw himself into active temperance work, and for some years he was engaged as agent of the East Cornwall Temperance Association, and later of the North of England Temperance League. He had to face a period of religious doubt, but found his deliverance through the teaching and inspiration of Theodore Parker, whose biographer in gratitude he afterwards became. At the age of thirty he gave himself to the Unitarian ministry, serving for short periods at Battle and at Clerkenwell successively, but then in February, 1876, removed to Walsall, where the chief work of his life was done. It was in 1877 that his popular book on "The Life and Teachings of Theodore Parker" was published. It was dedicated to Frances Power Cobbe, whose friendship he very highly prized.

Mr. Dean's ministry at Walsall lasted a full quarter of a century, and he left his mark in the life of the town. Always an ardent temperance advocate and life-long abstainer, he was an earnest politician, and a man of the strongest democratic sympathies. He took the deepest interest in popular education, and served for some years in the Walsall School Board. He was a trustee of the Municipal Charities, and was on the executive of the Walsall Hospital, the scene of Sister Dora's devoted labours. He was one of the Nonconformist chaplains of the cemetery, and in other ways took his full share in the public life of the town. He was well-known as a lecturer, and being much devoted to photography, gave many popular lantern lectures. At Walsall he set up a printing press, at which he worked with his own hands, and so did much of the necessary printing for his congregation.

In the autumn of 1901 Mr. Dean removed to Loughborough, and his departure from Walsall was marked by a town's presentation, in which members of various denominations and many public bodies, including the Chairman of the School Board (the vicar of St. Paul's) took part. When he went to Loughborough his strength was already failing, and early last year he retired from active service. After a strenuous life devoted to high ends he has earned his rest, and is remembered with honour and affection by many friends.

The funeral service at the Victoria-street Church, Loughborough, conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, on Thursday, April 20, was followed by cremation at Leicester. At the service Mr. Dean's old congregation at Walsall was represented by two members. Among the hymns sung was, "When the toil of day is done," and at the close the organist played Mendelssohn's "Funeral March."

MISS JANE CATHERINE FALLOWS.

By the death of Miss Jane C. Fallows, which took place on Good Friday, the church at Middlesbrough has lost one of its oldest and most loyal supporters. The deceased, who had attained her seventy-first birthday, was the second daughter of the late Mr. W. Fallows, the "Father of Middlesbrough." In the days when the Unitarian congregation met in the "Upper Room" in West-street—the first place of worship in the town—Miss Jane received baptism at the hands of the revered William Turner, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, so that her whole life has been spent in the atmosphere of Unitarian thought and worship. Never physically strong, she was unable to take that active part in church and school work which her two surviving sisters have always borne. But in other ways she was equally zealous and devoted, and industriously plied her needle for all bazaar purposes. Of a lovable, gentle, and peaceable nature she lived a quiet, unostentatious life, and leaves behind her many fragrant memories. Her devotion to the Church of her faith cannot be more eloquently shown than in the simple statement that, though she never heard a single word through her deafness, yet she was never missed from her place—twice every Sunday—except through illness. For over a year past she had been in failing health, and the end came very peacefully and without shock to her devoted and sorrowing sisters. Her remains were reverently laid in the family burial place on Easter Monday in the presence of a large number of friends, who thus paid their last tribute of respect to one whom to know was to love.

To commune with God, there is need of no subtle thought, no foreign tongue, no newest philosophy: "the pure in heart shall see" Him, and Fox and Bunyan can more truly make him known than "Masters of Sentences" and "Angelic Doctors."—Martineau.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I promised you some more stories about the home life of James Martineau, and I have more memories than I can write of the happy home that we had. On holidays we often had excursions in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, "across the water," as we called it when we crossed the broad Mersey in a steamer to New Brighton for a run among the sandhills and by the sea, or to Birkenhead and up Bidstone Hill to look across to the Welsh mountains beyond the Dee; or further sometimes to Hoylake; or a long walk to Speke Hall; or nearer, to the pretty "Dingle," so full of wild hyacinths and wood anemones and violets in the spring. Very often Father was too busy to go with us, but when he did come he was amongst the happiest of the party; and when he did not, we had to tell him all about our day as the hungry party sat at tea on our return.

Then on summer evenings there was gardening till it grew quite late, and one child after another was sent in from the garden to bed. We especially enjoyed watering the garden; then, with his coat off, Father would carry an immense watering pot, much too heavy for us, which we called "the pump." How lovely it was in that nice garden, and how the thrushes and blackbirds sang till dark in the big alder tree and the little wood behind it!

Father and one of our uncles had devised a little windmill, which was placed on the roof of the house, and the wind used to pump up the water into the cistern in the attics. But when there was no wind to turn the mill, and the cistern was nearly empty, Father would take off his coat, and climb out of the attic window, and sit on the parapet with one leg outside, doing the work of the wind, and pumping up the water till the cistern was filled. It always made us creep to look up from below, and see him on the very edge against the sky, his shirt sleeves and his curly hair fluttering as he moved; but he only laughed merrily when we were frightened, and said he was quite safe.

Some of the children, and some little cousins who lived in Liverpool and who used to come and spend their holiday afternoons with us, possessed a lot of nice ships. Living in a large seaport town, we were very fond of ships, and used to go and see the docks, and one of my brothers knew all about the different riggings of the ships and the different make of them. So his ships were all very correctly rigged, and we were all very proud of our fleet. Every spring a "Grand Review of the Fleet" was announced to the household by handbills, all the Admirals to be present. The review took place on the lake in the Prince's Park, to which all the ships were taken in procession. The Thunderbolt man-of-war, which had been made by my brother, with help from all the family, was too large and heavy to carry, and was wheeled on a little truck. Father got the boat out, and rowed us out in it to see that all the fleet sailed safely. One day one of the ships vanished during the review. She was the Victoria (for we were all very loyal). Father rowed us round and round the lake, and we peeped into every creek and bush, but she could not be found, till at last we spied the wee top of a mast with a little dripping flag; and, stretching out, father drew up the poor Victoria by her mast, dripping but unhurt.

In the evenings father would come home to tea, very tired after a long day's work—lessons to his own children before an early breakfast, then teaching in schools, sometimes lecturing, and writing sermons or lectures in his study. For some time, when we grew older, we had three or four girl friends living with us to share our lessons; and round the long tea-table we were a merry party of nine or ten—Mother pouring out the tea for all, behind the brown tea urn, and the plates of bread and butter and "bun-loaf" emptying very fast; for we too had busy days and worked hard. Only Father ate very little, but took several cups of tea, and whilst he sipped his tea he used to read aloud to us. He read us nearly all Walter Scott's novels and most of Dickens's stories, and many of Lover's legends, and some of Wordsworth's and Southey's poetry, and Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," and several other books. When we had finished our tea we got our work or drawing, and he still read on. You can hardly think how delightful those evenings were! When he hesitated whether he would read another chapter we all clamoured for more; and I am afraid he often sat up all the later into the night over his work because of that extra chapter; but then he enjoyed it as much as we did.

At Christmas time we always had a Christmas-tree lighted up with little candles and decorated, and presents for everyone were hung on the tree. Our cousins came to share it with us, and our Uncle and Aunt. Father used to take the dinner-bell and ring a little peal, for each in turn, in order of age, to cut some present from the tree. With his own presents he used to write little poems or inscriptions, always pretty and ingenious. For one of his girls to whom he gave the splendid present of a watch, he wrote: "For ——, if she will forgive so poor a compliment;

> For one who never loses time
> Ne'er wants the means to keep it."

In the summer holidays we always went into the country for a glorious six weeks, very often to the Lakes. One very hot day, in Borrowdale, as we sat at dinner and Father looked out over the lake to Skiddaw, and thought of the cool breezes on the top, he rashly said, "I should not be afraid to spend the night up there." We at once took up the idea, and obliged him to carry it out; and by sunset we were all of us climbing the mountain-side, not to come down till morning! How beautiful it was under the great calm dome of stars, but how hard the stones were! We were too excited to sleep more than a few winks, and one after another was seen sitting up, against the sky. It seemed soon to begin to get light, and though we had been almost cold in the night, when the sun rose gloriously above the mists that filled the valleys it at once grew hot again. We went home tired and very hungry, but triumphant, and had a sleep in the hot morning hours.

On Sunday evenings, after Father came home from his evening service and we had had supper, we used all to gather together in the drawing-room and sing hymns. He used generally to choose what we should sing, and his greatest favourites were Mr. Ogden's beautiful tunes. Father had never learnt to sing, but he was intensely fond of music, and had a beautiful tuneful voice which we loved to hear when he joined with all his heart in the hymns. I think one of his favourite hymns was—

> Lord, we sit and cry to thee,
> Like the blind beside the way, to which Mr. Ogden wrote a most beautiful tune. But he had many favourites. And as we dropped off one by one to go to bed, there was something infinitely tender and consecrating in his kiss and good-night.

DR. MARTINEAU TO DR. JESSOPP.

AN UNPUBLISHED LETTER.

The following letter appeared in the Eastern Daily Press on April 26, published at Norwich. Dr. Jessopp was for twenty years headmaster of the Norwich Grammar-school, from 1859 to 1879, when he became Rector of Scarning:—

To the Editor.

Sir,—I am glad to find that among your readers there are still to be found many earnest and thoughtful men and women who hold the name of James Martineau in honour, and who desire gratefully to celebrate his memory.

I am sure that to such persons the reading of the enclosed letter will be a source of profound pleasure.

Almost from my boyhood Mr. Martineau's writings exercised upon my young mind a strong fascination, and doubtless they, consciously or unconsciously, contributed to the building up of my character and intellect. When in the year 1888 the Clarendon Press published Martineau's great work, "A Study of Religion: Its Sources and Contents"—the author being then in his eighty-fourth year—I could not but rejoice at such a recognition of a great thinker and great teacher; and I wrote to Dr. Martineau to express my delight, and to offer him my sympathy and homage, at the same time telling him that I was deep in the study of his lately published volumes.

The letter sent me in reply speaks for itself. The sermon alluded to by the writer was one which I had recently preached in the University pulpit at Cambridge.

Augustus Jessopp,
Rector of Scarning,
Honorary Fellow of Worcester College, Oxford, and of St. John's College, Cambridge.

April 24.

(To the Rev. Aug. Jessopp, Rector of Scarning, D.D., some time Head Master of Norwich School, &c.)

The Polchar, Rothiemurchus,
Aviemore, N.B., July 16, 1888.

My Dear Sir,—There must, I fear, be something terribly amiss with me, that I seem just now to incur the "woe" which befalls "when all men speak well" of us. On my entire unconsciousness of any change in my too familiar shortcomings, the many generous marks of recognition received have come upon me with a surprise not untinged with awe. There can be no sin, however, in being grateful for them in their spontaneous succession, and not one of them has more deeply affected me than your letter of the 10th inst., with its noble commentary, the Cambridge sermon. It speaks to me almost as a word of benediction from a far-off home, coming as it does from one not less familiar than myself with the old school-room in the Norwich Close, where I consorted in the playground or competed in the class, with Brooke and Stodhart, Borrow, Rigby, and Dalrymple, and learned to respect the scholarship of our master, Edward Valpy, and laugh at the vanity of our usher, Banfather.

As so'e survivor of that group, I cannot but see its very sins dressed in a tender and softening light.

I am greatly impressed by the firmness of hand and clearness of eye with which the distinction between the transient and permanent aspects of human knowledge is drawn in the University Sermon, and delighted with its vindication of the intellectual rights of Theology. In claiming, however, on behalf of Theology a place among the Sciences, I always feel embarrassed by the established English meaning of the word Science—the process of intelligent dealing with phenomena—as compared with [the] wider German Wissenschaft—knowledge on any terms, with or without process, of any object, phenomenon, or entity. In the narrower sense, Theology—the intellectual apprehension of God, the ultimate ground of phenomena, is not a science, but the presupposition of all science, as the postulate of Space is of all Geometry. In the wider sense, Theology is a Wissenschaft; both terms of the relation between phenomenon and ground consisting as joint factors in the knowledge. But, as the constant factor is intuitively provided in the very constitution of the intelligence, it is a datum, and not a process; and cannot in itself, as an object known, supply the material and movement of a separate science.

It is in the variable factor that all the growth must lie, always charging the Infinite Cause with new or changed contents. Science of God, in this sense, becomes identical with the science of the Kosmos.

Similarly, Morals, as the doctrine, not of character that is, but of character that ought to be, would seem to lie beyond the category of Science in the English sense, and till we can make the word mean simply the methodised treatment of objects conformable with the Laws of Thought, I incline not to ask for the recognition of Theology and Morals as on the list of the Sciences, as commonly understood, but to assign them to a separate plane, under one of the now despised names—Metaphysics or Philosophy.

I did not mean to allow a mere question of phraseology to run away with me in this fashion. And I must apologise for its irrelevance.

Thanking you most heartily for your genial and strengthening words,—I am, my dear sir, yours most sincerely,

James Martineau.

THE NORWICH MEMORIAL.

THE Martineau Centenary Celebrations at Norwich, the city of his birth, have now been held, and the congregation of the Octagon Chapel, where as a child he first learnt to know the sacredness of public worship, has received a fresh consecration from the memory of those days and the services of thanksgiving and commemoration and aspiration, which have been held. To young and old alike it will be a great memory, that in that venerable house of prayer, consecrated from the first to the purest spirit of Christian worship and a broad and loving spirit of inclusiveness, where the child came with his parents, where the young man brought his youthful ardour, to kindle others also to works of practical beneficence, where the man in his prime, with the splendour of his genius, and the fervour of his high prophetic gifts, came to speak his word and join his prayers with those of friends old and new, at the Centenary of the chapel, where the affectionate memories of the old man never wearied of returning —that there the centenary of the birth of James Martineau was fitly commemorated, and they of the new generation took their part with earnest and reverent endeavour to make the occasion worthy of its high purpose, and of the spirit of the Teacher they were intent to honour. The words of faith and grateful and reverent commemoration, spoken at this Easter time, will remain among the possessions of the congregation, as they are in the hearts of many other friends, and the life of the congregation cannot fail to be the stronger and the more devoted to high ends, for these days of fellowship in noble thought and profound emotion.

And yet we must remember that the matter is not ended here. The Octagon congregation is engaged in a work of very serious practical import, and it has been rightly judged that this Centenary celebration ought not to be kept apart, but ought to bear fruit in what is of the most vital concern, and can best testify to the living power of religion in the hearts of those who would honour the memory of a beloved Teacher.

More than eighty years ago JAMES MARTINEAU came home to Norwich, after the first term or the first session of his student life at York, and in the zeal of his new purpose to be utterly devoted to the work of the ministry, took part with others, of kindred spirit, in the establishment of a Sunday-school in connection with the Octagon Chapel. This is now an oft-told tale, and the great traditions of the school are known and honoured, and with them the memory of other faithful workers and the names of DOWSON, MOTTRAM, BOLINGBROKE, MADGE, WADE, FREEMAN, STEVENS, and many another. The boys' and the girls' school both have done for generations admirable work, and they are to-day alive with a strenuous and eager purpose, and the life of the congregation is largely wrapt up in the schools, and in the other helpful work associated with them, into which a great band of young people, who hold the promise of the future, full of zeal and hope, are being drawn. But now these schools, and this social work of brotherly helpfulness, the mark of a living church, require a fitting home, and unless it is secured, the promise of the future may be sadly disappointed. What more natural than that into this grateful commemoration of a great life should be brought this thought, instinct with his faith, very near to the deepest sympathies of his heart, of the MARTINEAU Memorial Hall and Schools?

During the celebrations of the past days the minister and members of the Octagon Chapel exercised a commendable reticence as to their aims and hopes; but other friends were not silent. The MAYOR of Norwich, at the luncheon, expressed his great satisfaction at hearing that there was to be so valuable a permanent memorial of the centenary raised in the city, and Mr. BLAKE ODGERS, as chairman of the public meeting on Good Friday, made a clear statement of the position, and of the urgent need, with the confident hope that friends would not let this opportunity pass of completing a worthy memorial and securing the future of a great work. In the same sense Mr. TARRANT spoke, as president of the Sunday School Association, with a special word of sympathy for the needs of the children, and the opportunities for unselfish work open to the young people, and Mr. BOWIE, as secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, offering the sympathy and good wishes of his committee, and Mr. AGATE, speaking on behalf of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire. All alike wished well to the undertaking, and looked with hope for the gifts of generous friends.

We shall hear, perhaps, next week more definitely from the officers of the Norwich committee how matters stand, but we know that at least £3,000 is still required to secure the worthy completion of the scheme for this memorial. It would be a very happy issue of this commemoration if during the next few days our friends at Norwich could receive the promise of at least two gifts of £500 each, or of one generous £1,000 and ten promises of £100 each. Then the way would open with great joy, and the remaining £1,000 would surely be secured by the humbler gifts of many other friends. The members of the Octagon congregation are giving and working to the utmost of their strength, the young people are kindled with a very genuine enthusiasm; but it is impossible for them to do this thing alone. Yet for the sake not only of the one congregation, but the whole future of our Liberal Faith in an important province, and for the sake of that great memory which we are all eager to honour, it ought to be done, and to be done now.

Promises of gifts should be sent to Mrs. F. A. MOTTRAM, 21, Bracondale, Norwich; or to Mr. W. N. LADELL, 69, Grove-road, Lakenham, Norwich.

ON Easter Sunday a memorial to Dr Martineau was dedicated in the Blackwater-street Church at Rochdale. It is of pure white marble, with an excellent likeness of Martineau, and bears the following inscription:—"To James Martineau, D.D., 'the greatest thinker of "his time,' and the foremost representa"tive of Unitarian thought. He was a "teacher of ideal truth, and during his "long and saintly life of 94 years ren"dered inestimable services to the study "of religion and philosophy. He was the "preacher at the opening of this build"ing, June 11, 1857. He died January 11, "1900, and upon the centenary of his "birth, April 21, 1905, this memorial was "set up by Richard Heape." Then follow the well-known lines of Wordsworth on Milton, "Thy soul was like a star and dwelt apart," to the end of the sonnet. The preacher on Sunday morning was Principal Gordon, who paid an eloquent tribute to Martineau as a thinker and as a Unitarian, as one "who drew out of Unitarian Christianity what was there, and showed it to us and made us feel it as a consistent whole in which freedom and faith had perfect harmony." and he concluded:—"Meantime this "character leaves upon us a strong impres"sion of his greatness. Great was he "in work; great was he likewise in faith. "And his work is not ended; his faith has "not yet said its latest word. With feebler "powers and yet, it may be, with larger "opportunities, we may take this great "example as the moving force of our "further endeavour and we may say on "this day of commemoration as those "said as they turned back from Emmaus, "he has vanished from our sight, but "were not our hearts burning within us "as he went with us on the way, and "opened to us the eternal truth of God?"

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

THE NORWICH CELEBRATION.

The Centenary of the birth of James Martineau at Norwich, on April 21, 1805, was celebrated in that city by a series of services and meetings, which have left the happiest memories, as having worthily marked the significance of the occasion. The city itself, in the person of its Mayor and Sheriff, and other members of the Corporation, took part in the commemoration, and while the attendance of visitors from a distance was not very large, it was representative of the chief interests of Dr. Martineau's life, and the Octagon congregation had the happiness of welcoming his three surviving children and other members of the family.

Among those present were Miss Gertrude Martineau, Miss Edith Martineau, Mr. and Mrs. Basil Martineau, Mrs. Russell Martineau, Mr. and Mrs. David Martineau, Miss M. C. Martineau, the Rev. P. M. Higginson and Miss Higginson. Manchester College was represented by the Principal, Dr. Drummond, and the Revs. C. B. Upton and J. Estlin Carpenter; the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties by its President, Mr. Wallace Bruce; the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire by the Rev. Dendy Agate; the Sunday School Association by its President, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; the British and Foreign Unitarian Association by several members of the Committee, including Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. C. F. Pearson, and the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie; the Little Portland-street Congregation by a former minister, Dr. Martineau's successor, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, and Mrs. Wicksteed; and Hope-street Church, Liverpool, by Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Hall. Among other visitors were Mrs. H. Rutt, Mrs. Blake Odgers, Mrs. Charles Taylor and Miss Taylor, Miss C. Scott, Miss A. L. Browne, Miss Worsley, Miss Case, Mrs. Lloyd and Mr. Lee Lloyd, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. Charles Fenton, the Revs. H. W. Perris, Frederick Allen, L. Tavener, John Birks, and Mr. and Mrs. V. D. Davis.

Good Friday was the actual anniversary of the birthday, but as a welcome prelude to the commemoration, the Rev. Alfred Hall, the present minister of the Octagon Chapel, gave on the Thursday evening a lantern lecture in the old chapel on "The Martineaus in Norwich." This was of the greatest interest, and was amply illustrated by a number of portraits and other pictures. Mr. Hall referred not only to the Huguenot ancestry of the Martineaus, but showed on the screen a genealogical table which he had prepared, and from which it appeared that on the English side Dr. Martineau was descended from at least three of the ejected ministers of 1662.

Mr. G. A. King, whose interesting articles on Norwich memories and the Octagon Chapel our readers will remember, presided at the lecture, and on the motion of Mr. David Martineau a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Hall. The lecture was fully reported in the Eastern Daily Press of April 22.

On the previous Tuesday a meeting of the Norwich Town Council had been held, at which the following resolution was unanimously passed:—

"That this Council, believing that the "memory of great men is amongst the "richest endowments of a city, expresses, "on the occasion of the centenary of the "birth of James Martineau, its admira- "tion of his genius, and its sense of the "honour that Norwich has in being the "birthplace of one of the great influences "upon the thought and life of the "nation."

The resolution, which was moved by Mr. Henderson, seconded by Mr. E. Wild, and supported by Mr. A. M. Stevens, having been passed, the Mayor, Mr. H. Z. T. Flowers, said that he proposed to attend the commemoration service at the Octagon Chapel on Friday morning, and invited the members of the Council to accompany him and the Sheriff on that occasion. He then read the following communication, which he had received, respecting the Martineau family:—

"One of Dr. Martineau's ancestors "was John Hall, who served the office of "Mayor of this city twice, and that of "Sheriff once, first in the year 1701. To "this office he was elected by his fellow "citizens in consequence of the steady and "powerful support he gave to the Hano- "verian succesion. His portrait is in St. "Andrew's Hall as one of the most able "and conspicuous of our citizens. The "great-grandfather of Dr. Martineau was "Philip Meadows, who was Sheriff of "Norwich in 1724 and Mayor in 1734. To "others who occupied these civic offices "he was distantly related, for instance, "David, Peter, and Francis Colombine, "Edward Rigby and Peter Finch. Dr. "Martineau's uncle was Philip Meadows "Martineau, who, in 1810, was elected "principal surgeon of the Norfolk and "Norwich Hospital, and was eminent "throughout the country for his skill. "To his initiative is to be ascribed the "Public Library, which was the beginning "of our Norfolk and Norwich Subscription "Library, and was finally merged into "it. On his estate at Trowse and Laken- "ham he built Bracondale House, and "through it ran what is known as Mar- "tineau Lane. Dr. Martineau's brother "Thomas was surgeon to the hospital "from 1819 to 1823, and it was said "that had his career not been cut short "at the early age of thirty, he would have "considerably increased the fame of this "city for its medical skill."

The Centenary Service.

Early in the morning of Good Friday the Rev. Dendy Agate conducted a Communion service in the Octagon Chapel, in which he was assisted at the distribution by the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and V. D. Davis. In the course of the service Mr. Agate read passages from the first Communion Address in Dr. Martineau's "Hours of Thought."

At eleven o'clock a further service of Commemoration was held, attended by the Mayor and Sheriff, the Town Clerk, and members of the Council in state, and there was a very large congregation. During the past century, three previous mayors of Norwich had been members of the Octagon congregation—Nathaniel Bolingbroke, 1819, Sir John Harrison Yallop, 1831, John Mooro, 1895, and their terms of office are recorded in the chapel on three old frames for holding the civic sword and maces (inscribed with those names and dates), usually hung on one of the pillars. These were placed on Friday in front of the pulpit, and there the sword and maces and other quaint symbols of civic dignity rested during the service. The Mayor and Sheriff attended in their robes and chains of office, and the whole congregation rose when th y entered, just before the service began, while the organist played the national anthem.

The service was conducted by the Revs. Alfred Hall and J. Estlin Carpenter, and began most fittingly with Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill's glorious hymn:—

We come unto our fathers' God;
Their rock is our salvation;
The Eternal Arms, their dear abode,
We make our habitation;
We bring thee, Lord, the praise they brought,
We seek thee as thy saints have sought
In every generation.

The lessons were from Ecclesiasticus xliv., "Let us now praise famous men," and passages from Mark xiv. and Ephes. iv. The anthem was Mendelssohn's "How lovely are the messengers." The hymns before and after the sermon were Dr. Martineau's own, "Where is your God, they say," and "Thy way is in the deep, O Lord." The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, from the text Ephes. iv. 13, and will be found printed in full in our present issue. At the evening meeting Mr. Hall rightly characterised it as a great sermon, worthy to rank with those other three—the sermon preached by Dr. John Taylor at the opening of the Octagon Chapel, in May, 1756, and the sermons preached by the Revs. Thomas Madge and James Martineau at the centenary of the chapel in 1856.

The Luncheon.

At the conclusion of the service there was a luncheon at the Maid's Head Hotel, one of the oldest of Norwich inns, at which the Mayor and Sheriff were also present, with a company of over a hundred in all. Mr. W. H. Scott, chairman of the Octagon congregation, presided, and after lunch proposed the health of the King. Mr. A. M. Stevens then read some letters of regret for absence, including one from the Rev. Alexander Gordon, a former minister of the Octagon, who said he should be engaged in a similar commemoration elsewhere, and one from Miss S. S. Dowson, of Beccles, who said that it would be matter of very great regret to her if no member of her family was able to be present. Mr. Louis Tillett, M.P., Mr. George White, M.P., the Rev. Alexander Ford, Mrs. Barrett, who wrote on behalf of Dr. Barrett, and Mrs. Stuart were among those who sent letters of regret.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, at the Chairman's call, spoke to the sentiment of the memory of Dr. Martineau. There was, he said, some special appropriateness in that duty being placed in his hands, since he was there as President of the Sunday School Association, and care for the religious education of children was one of the great interests of Dr. Martineau's life, while they desired that the permanent memorial of that centenary should also be especially for the help of the young people. He then went on to speak very happily of the beauty of Dr. Martineau's style, as an artist in language, with a wonderful power of exact and beautiful expression. Like Tennyson, Martineau had the highest gifts, yet recognised that they must not be left uncultivated. He also applied to Martineau Spenser's doctrine—

> That of the soul the body form doth take,
> For soul is form, and doth the body make.

It was the high emotion, the spirit in Martineau, which took on his characteristic eloquence and made his literature the grand and eloquent thing it was, so that his prose became a poem—symmetrical, beautiful, precise and pure. His example, both in spirit and in matter, was one which, while they could not rival, they might hope to humbly imitate.

The Rev. Alfred Hall also spoke, and recalled the deep impression made upon him in early life by the habitual use of Dr. Martineau's Ninth and Tenth Services in the Book of Common Prayer for Christian Worship. In conclusion, he said that the chief fact about Dr. Martineau was that he was a man of God. In memory of him he invited those present to stand in reverent silence.

Mr. David Martineau, as the present head of the family, spoke in response, and referred to the precious associations of the Octagon Chapel and the large connection of the Martineaus and Taylors. It must make them proud in one sense, but humble in another, to be so connected.

Mr. W. Wallace Bruce then proposed the toast of the ancient city of Norwich. He had come there, he said, as President of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South Eastern Counties, but was asked to speak to that toast as a member of the London County Council. He expressed the conviction that they of the most recent municipal authority, and the members of that ancient borough, had the same problems to deal with, and were engaged in the same endeavour to secure better conditions for the life of the people.

The Mayor and Sheriff both made genial response, and expressed their pleasure in taking part in that Commemoration. The Mayor said he had been familiar with the name of Martineau for sixty-five years, and he was glad that there was to be a permanent memorial of that celebration. He concluded by handing to the chairman a copy of the commemorative resolution passed by the Council on April 18.

Mr. G. A. King proposed the sentiment of "Civil and Religious Liberty," to which the Rev. Dendy Agate responded, taking the occasion to present the greetings of the committees of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and the Manchester District Association, and their earnest hope for the fulfilment of the congregation's desire for a permanent memorial.

Mr. A. M. Stevens proposed the health of the visitors, to which the Rev. V. D. Davis and Mr. Charles Fenton responded, and the company then dispersed, a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. David Martineau, being carried by acclamation.

Most of the visitors proceeded from the Maid's Head to the Strangers' Hall, in Charing Cross, under the guidance of Mr. G. A. King, and were there received by Mr. Leonard Bolingbroke, the present owner of that picturesque and interesting old house, which he has made a veritable museum of antiquarian interest.

Public Meeting.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Octagon Chapel, when there was a large attendance, and a series of eloquent addresses were given.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., was in the chair, and after the singing of an opening hymn, said that on that day exactly a hundred years ago James Martineau was born in that city, when George III. was King, and William Pitt Prime Minister; and he then drew a vivid picture of the contrast between that time and the present. 1805 was the year, also, of the battle of Trafalgar, which secured England from the danger of a French invasion; but it was the year, also, of Austerlitz which killed Pitt, and next year came Jena, and then Fox died. As to the condition of the people in those days, there was no national provision for popular education, no machinery of local government, such as they now had, and no sanitary authority, to look after the health of the people. There were the old grammar schools, and to the excellent grammar school at Norwich James Martineau went as a boy. Mr. Odgers then touched upon the incidents of Dr. Martineau's career, and mentioned the fact that while he was teaching at Dr. Lant Carpenter's school at Bristol, at the close of his college course, his own father had also been there as a writing and arithmetic master, and that when the school was afterwards conducted by Mrs. Carpenter for girls, his mother had been a pupil. He recalled his early impressions of Dr. Martineau when he first came up to London, as the preacher at Little Portland-street, as superintendent of the Portland schools, as a masterly extempore speaker in the Manchester College Debating Society, and as a genial and kindly host in his own house, than whom no better friend for young students could be found. Of the great speech which Dr. Martineau made in proposing his scheme for the better organisation of our Churches at the National Conference at Leeds in 1888, Mr. Odgers spoke as worthy of that other grand old man, William Ewart Gladstone.

Professor Upton spoke on Dr. Martineau's relation to philosophical thought among Unitarians, and to the world of religious thought around. It was a most valuable address, the substance of which we hope soon to publish as an independent article in supplement to those recently contributed by Mr. Upton to these columns. The necessarianism of Priestley, in which Martineau was brought up, was contrasted with the more subtle doctrine of prevalent philosophy, and the danger of both to the religious life was pointed out. There never was a time, Mr. Upton said, when Martineau's ethical message to the world was more needed to be enforced than in the present age. One of the great benefits which Dr. Martineau conferred was that he enabled the Unitarian body to fling off that incubus of fatalism which had been weighing heavily on their inner life and endangering their moral and religious enthusiasm. The incubus of fatalism always tended to fall on the human soul wherever its moral and spiritual life was overshadowed by its intellectual life. Every age had its form of fatalism. Those who caught the true spirit of Martineau's teaching would be most anxious to preserve themselves and society in general from being paralysed by a kind of subtle determinism stealing over it, which, though it was not so manifest as Priestleyan determinism, was none the less fatal to man's higher life. It was then shown how to the doctrine of moral freedom was added a new teaching of the self-revelation of God in the soul of man, so that no attestation of miracle or prophecy was needed, since truth shone by its own light, and wherever the Divine Spirit expressed itself through great poets, prophets or philosophical seers, there was a chapter in the great Bible of humanity. That doctrine brought an entirely new conception of authority in religion, which Dr. Martineau had developed in his great book on that subject. His grand thoughts were operating throughout the Christian world, and the world of liberal religious thought everywhere. "They will go on," said Mr. Upton, "conquering and to conquer. I conclude with the hope and the prayer that our fellow-religionists on both sides of the Atlantic may never unlearn those grand ethical and spiritual lessons which both Dr. Channing and Dr. Martineau have so impressively taught and so gloriously illustrated in their dignified and beautiful lives."

The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter spoke of some of the leading features of the characteristics of Dr. Martineau as a religious teacher. Everyone knew that he effected a great transformation in the character of the Unitarian household of faith, in which he was born, and educated, and to which he remained faithful to his latest days. Everyone knew, also, that, besides all the profound, theological reasonings, founded partly on his study of the Scriptures, partly, also, on his interpretation of the moral nature of man, which led him to new phases of Christianity—besides these, he laid broad and deep the bases of religious belief, so that in an age staggered by the assaults of science, he became the leading support, and stay, and guide of those who still clung to a spiritual religion. He showed them how to find the foundations of that faith in the sanctuary of their own souls. The religion of Dr. Martineau, he noted, was not that of the closet, nor that of a recluse from the world. A student he was, and one who lived laborious days, but, at the same time, his interest in humanity was always fresh and strong. He was a keen observer of all that he saw around him, and his religious life was constantly fed not only by his profound studies, but by the rich life of affection and fellowship which knit him to the world around.

This was illustrated by the manifold activities of his life in Liverpool, in which the practical interests were so remarkable and so varied, marked in its latter years by a keen sympathy with what would now be called social democracy. Thus it appeared how erroneous was the idea that his great conceptions of philosophy and religion were excogitated in the seclusion of his study and had nothing to do with the affairs of common life. On the other hand, it was his extraordinary sympathy with life which led him to make that great change to which Professor Upton had already drawn their attention.

Mr. Carpenter then further illustrated the change which had taken place in Dr. Martineau's conception of authority in religion, from the time when at his ordination in 1828 he affirmed that he received the words of Jesus as the oracles of God, to the days when, after Baur, he learnt to interpret the New Testament as the product of successive stages of Christian development, and came to recognise Unitarianism as one dialect among several in the Early Church. He then spoke of the great beauty and power of Dr. Martineau's devotional writings, and referring to his sermons said that Martineau seemed to him to have been the Tennyson of preachers. In his "Endeavours" there was an extraordinary affinity with the spirit of "In Memoriam"; and it was happy for two such men of genius that in later life they found each other out. Of Martineau's characteristics Mr. Carpenter noted first of all his personal sincerity, which rose to a kind of impassioned force marking all his utterance. He never paltered with any insincere conformity. And his love of liberty was no less impassioned than his sincerity. Then there was in him a constant aspiration after perfection. He had been taught to live always in the light of high endeavour, and could not be content with anything less than the best. They could not reproduce his genius, but they might emulate his endeavour, and feel the force of his great example. They might follow him, not indeed without faltering, along that upward way, whither he had passed, not as one who had already attained, as though he were already perfect—whither he had gone into the larger life, where doubt was cleared and love was satisfied and aspiration fulfilled, and the soul was joined in everlasting union with its God.

The Rev. W Copeland Bowie spoke with the warm gratitude of an old student, and as one who, reared in the Calvinism of Scotland, after the shattering of his old beliefs had found through the teaching of Dr. Martineau that rest for the mind and peace for the heart which came only once in a lifetime to those who passed through such a struggle. In Martineau's great doctrine of the constant Divine Cause and the Eternal Righteousness there was not only intellectual satisfaction, but spiritual inspiration, and he was constantly receiving letters from distant lands telling the same story of how, where faith had crumbled away, the religious teaching of James Martineau had saved men and glorified their whole nature. It was well to bear that testimony, for there were many others to whom his teaching would bring light and joy and peace; and they were thankful that the charm of his beautiful character as well as his noble mind remained with them—a possession they would cherish as long as they lived. The old orthodoxies in their intellectual and critical side were being shattered to pieces, and happily a stiff and defiant materialism was also passing away. The time was rapidly approaching when there would be a chance for the presentation of a spiritual religion as never before in this country, and it behoved those especially who had the training of boys and girls in their charge to take care that they were implanting principles in their minds, and seeds of love and goodness in their hearts, which increasing years and experience would not rob them of and which no knowledge in the future could destroy. Martineau had helped them to reach that position, in which they were assured that a living, loving religion was independent of all external authority, and he trusted that those who would be inspired by his pure and noble spirit would go forward to leave their corner of the world a little brighter and better for their having lived in it.

The Rev. H. W. Perris, who spoke as a former minister of the Octagon, and the Rev. Alfred Hall having also spoken, a vote of thanks to the Chairman and speakers, moved by Mr. A. M. Stevens, and acknowledged by the Chairman, brought the meeting to a close.

Saturday's Visits.

Saturday was devoted to a series of visits to places of special interest in Norwich, and in the evening to a lecture on Wordsworth, given by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, at the Octagon Institute, in aid of the Memorial Building Fund. Sunday engagements had called some of the visitors from a distance home, but a good number remained, who with the Norwich friends made up very pleasant parties. In the morning the Castle Museum was inspected under the guidance of Mr. James Mottram, and early in the afternoon the Cathedral was visited, where Mr. G. A. King acted as guide. Thence the party went by special tram out to Bracondale Woods, where Mr. Russell Colman conducted them through the beautiful grounds formerly in the possession of Dr. Martineau's uncle, the distinguished surgeon, Philip Meadows Martineau, and of his daughter Miss Fanny Martineau, who died there, the last of the family in Norwich, in 1877. The adjoining estate of Carrow Abbey also formerly belonged to the family, and there the party was received by Dr. James Stuart and Mrs. Stuart with the greatest kindness, and shown over the interesting old house and grounds, and most hospitably entertained to tea. Through the kindness of the Misses Coleman they were also able to see the fine Watts pictures at Carrow House.

Easter Sunday.

The services at the Octagon Chapel on Easter Sunday continued the Centenary Commemoration. At the morning service, which was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, the anthem was "I waited for the Lord," from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and the Rev. P. M. Higginson preached the sermon, which dwelt upon the true grounds of our faith in the life after death, and quoting the aspiration of George Eliot's lines on "The Choir Invisible," pointed out how we might give to them a deeper meaning than her faith allowed. The trust of the continued influence of Dr. Martineau in this present world, he reminded his hearers, was largely in the hands of those who were called to be true to his spirit.

In the afternoon a children's service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. Frederick Allen, when the address was given by the Rev. V. D. Davis.

The evening service was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, the anthem being Spohr's "As pants the hart"; and the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed gave a deeply interesting address, consisting chiefly of personal impressions and recollections of Dr. Martineau, gathered from his own knowledge, extending over a period of forty years.

A brief organ recital after the service brought the whole commemoration to a close.

The collections at the services in aid of the Memorial Building Fund realised £30 0s. 8d., and Mr. Wicksteed's lecture £7 11s., and possibly a little more. We must hope that the deep interest awakened by this series of meetings will open fresh fountains of generous giving, to secure the speedy erection of the memorial buildings, for which there is such urgent need.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting was held at Monton on Good Friday, and there was an exceptionally large attendance of teachers and friends. The centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth provoked an enthusiastic interest, and the day's proceedings were fully worthy of the occasion. The morning congregation numbered at least 750 persons. It was exhilarating to listen to the singing of the hymns (three of the four were Martineau's own) by such a gathering. The Rev. Principal Gordon was the preacher, and his sermon made a deep and lasting impression.

The Sermon.

The text was John xii. 24: "If it die it beareth much fruit." Mr. Gordon referred to the fact that Anselm died on April 21, 1109, a scholastic philosopher, who sought to reduce the truths of religion into a connected series of reasonings, and who, though not of English birth, yet did his greatest work on English soil, and that Abelard, the keenest and boldest theologian of his century, died on April 21, 1142. The day was called GOOD Friday, though it commemorated the death of the greatest of all men, who suffered on the Cross, because through his sorrows and pain we have learnt what could not otherwise have been learnt, namely, that to die is not to lose life, but to secure its translation and its increase. It is so in the physical world, where it never means destruction, but something more than dissolution. That which is true of the body and of the spirit is true also of the spiritual products which we most prize. He whose words were spirit and life never meant them to be imprisoned in any unvarying terms of an ancient tongue. Seeing that Christianity is no mere system of teaching, but preeminently a method of action, we need an interpretation not less valuable, indeed, indispensable. Heresy is often the liberator of that which has been fraudulently locked up. Christianity is for use, or it is nothing worth.

There are, the preacher said, interpreters of whom we may say, in the antique phrase which is not a mere figure, that they are "the body of Christ"—organs and agents of his living unquenchable spirit still acting upon earth. These desire to assimilate into their life the message of the Master, and to distribute that message over the world, feeling that the religion they love would otherwise be but the object of a sect. Theirs is the greater service, for the interpreters of the Master's meaning become antiquated with the changes of time, whereas the interpreters of the Master's aims render a more permanent service to mankind. For character is more lasting than thought.

Sunday, April 21, 1805, brought into our world one of whom it could be truly said that he had earned the right to die. Not mere intellect but fruit-bearing life places the name of James Martineau in a line with those of the older world to whom reference has been made. Anselm, first among Christian thinkers, sought to establish the being of God on grounds of pure reason, without reference to scriptural authority. He claimed that our thought of God implied the being of God. His masterly grasp moves us with admiration, and more, we think of his fearlessness, his courage in defending the right, his magnanimity, and above all, the deep spirituality of his inner life. As to Abelard, we admire the lucid insight of his theology, and his belief that we are convinced in reason, not otherwise. "Understand that thou mayst believe" was his motto, not "Believe that thou mayst understand." He was Christ's philosopher. "I might speak of Martineau the philosopher, of Martineau the theologian, of Martineau the vindicator of the moral liberty of the individual, of the responsibility of human character. He in his earlier days lifted the Unitarian controversy to its highest plane at once of solid argument and literary expression, and in his later work deposed with reverent hand from their seats of usurped authority the idols of the Church, that God in conscience might reign supreme. Rendering the most unspeakable service of all, he showed himself as declarer of God to an age almost superstitious in its adoration of mere physics; became an exponent of Divine reality in the face of sheer materialism, an exponent of Divine accessibility in an atmosphere of agnosticism, an exponent of Divine personality when a wave of pantheism was sweeping over many minds. This he effected not by mere subtlety of argument, not by mere splendour of illustration, but by a still more beautiful suasion—by the well-nigh irresistible compulsion of a spirit penetrated through and through with conviction which he sought to communicate to other spirits.

"He soared to things above, yet never lost touch with things at hand. He touched the problems of everyday life, approaching the needs of every soul, and probing every conscience."

Tempting as was the field of thought in all these directions, yet preaching on that occasion he wished, Mr. Gordon said, to confine his message to them as teachers. In them the one thing needful was personality; more important was it than physics or metaphysics, or theological acumen, or Bible expertness. They must realise the force and reality of example. There are writers who are greater than their books; there are books that are greater than their writers. The power of the preacher and teacher rests in this—that the work comes up to the word. Martineau's was not a life which was conspicuously before the world. It did not fall to his lot to make discoveries which, like Priestley's, for instance, revolutionised the world. He had an intense personal grasp of that which he apprehended; skill and force in representing it; and power to revise positions which became in his hands fraught with new meaning. His Huguenot blood, his Unitarian training, and his business experience all conspired to form his character. His life was based on two principles:—Things spiritual came first; and conscience was the loadstar of life. His strenuousness is apparent no matter what corner of his life we make our way into; whether organising a movement or writing a letter, the whole man was there, doing what he had to do. He had the instinct of perfection, and he cultivated it not as a fringe or ornament, but as a reality. Magnanimity was another of his traits. It was shown in his choice of a career. Things which might have been to other men serious blows were dealt with quite calmly by him; such, for instance, was his rejection when a candidate for a university chair. It was also manifested when he failed to move his co-religionists to join him in furthering a scheme which he thought for the common good, or when he could not restrain other men from movements of which he did not approve. They were all with him uplifting experiences, and through them he exhibited a true greatness. Again, sympathy was the secret of his catholicity, the root of his sincerity, the cause of his being so much loved. It was also largely the secret of the fascination of his address. Martineau was a teacher, and everyone knows how valuable to him was time; it was in his early days an asset requisite to his maintenance. He held congregational classes; sometimes, though not regularly, he personally superintended his Sunday-school. In Liverpool, week in and week out he devoted an hour to the teaching of poor boys, and another to the teaching of poor girls in the elements of religion. A study of his life would elevate our ideals and straighten the practice of our lives.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

After dinner, in the adjoining schools, the business meeting was held, when the chair was occupied by the President, the Rev. T. P. Spedding. The printed report contained over fifty pages of most interesting record of work done during the past year. This work has so grown of late that it enlists the services of two general secretaries and five departmental secretaries. The Association now includes seventy-five schools, with 14,850 scholars on the books and 1,421 teachers. In moving the adoption of the report, the President said that it was full of encouragement, and the last year had been marked by a considerable measure of success. There had been serious losses of generous subscribers and faithful ministers. Long service medals had been discontinued; it was thought no longer right to impose upon the generosity which was only in the first instance meant for one year. Referring to the fact that the examination system had ceased to take a prominent place, he said that as far back as 1849 the opinion was expressed by the late Rev. Joseph Freeston that it would be well to omit from the Sunday-school teaching those subjects which were taught in the day schools or on week evenings. When the first report was issued in 1846 there were eighteen schools in the Association, and the scholars on the books numbered 3,599, including some of the largest schools in the Manchester district. To-day the average number of scholars per school was larger for the seventy-two schools which had sent in returns than it was for the eighteen schools in 1846, though the latter were all large, and a number of the schools to-day were necessarily very small, being situated in small villages. The average then was 200; now it is 209. The attendance of elder scholars is increasing. There was no room for pessimism. The fact that morning attendance was going down was no proof that the Sunday-school was a failing institution. The morning decrease was almost entirely compensated for by the afternoon increase. The increased attendance of elder scholars demanded more capable guidance than ever. The best equipped men and women were needed as leaders as well as teachers. There was now a host of agencies competing with the Sunday-school for the young men, and amidst so many counter attractions it was remarkable that Sunday-schools should be able to hold their own at all. The weakness was that so many Sunday scholars passed through the schools and did not enter into church membership. The Sunday-schools were too often only recruiting grounds for other and secular institutions. "Impart as much instruction as possible, but do not neglect sentiment. You have to bring home the conviction that the zeal for young life is as worthy as a zeal for politics or anything else." There were untold possibilities of usefulness before the Association. It was doing a great work, and was splendidly officered. He referred to the Holiday Home, the Convalescent Home, the visitors and the lecturers. There was need for a central office and a book depôt. He pleaded also for a Sunday School Missionary to take up the work of attaching the elder scholars to the work of the Churches.

Mr. J. WIGLEY seconded the motion, and the report was adopted.

In moving the election of the officers for the year, the Rev. J. A. Pearson suggested the holding of an arts and crafts exhibition in Manchester in connection with the schools. He also urged the schools to give facilities to trade unions for holding their meetings in the school buildings. He noticed from a recent report that out of 76 trade unions 51 met in public-houses and only five met in schools of any kind. A cordial welcome was extended to the representatives of kindred societies, and the officers and committee were elected, the Rev. T. P. Spedding being re-elected president. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to Principal Gordon for his valued services as preacher.

EVENING MEETING.

Mr. GEORGE H. LEIGH presided over the evening meeting, and extended a cordial welcome on behalf of both church and school. In the Sunday-school, he said, they had rightly attached very great importance to personal influence on the lives of their scholars; but apart from that they must feel that they had still a great deal to do to bring themselves up to the level of present-day secular education in their ethical and religious teaching. It was an extremely difficult problem, but he thought there never was a time when they had greater helps towards its solution than they had now. In his "Bible Reading for Schools," Matthew Arnold led the way for a better understanding of the Scriptures. That had been followed by Prof. George Adam Smith's splendid geography of the Holy Land; and quite recently by that extremely interesting publication Dent's "Bible," with its introduction by Boyd Carpenter. An "Ethical Sunday-school," published by the Ethical Society, was also helpful. An attempt had been made in America to treat teaching in the Sunday-school on ethical lines, and had met with considerable success. It was of great importance to endeavour to bring the parents of the scholars into closer sympathy with the work of the school, for they do not for the most part realise what it meant. Their co-operation and interest must be somehow obtained. It was desirable in every possible way to cultivate the affections and imagination of the scholars; and help them to discharge the practical duties of life.

The Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS, of Bury, read a Paper on "The Wesley Guild Movement: a hint to our own Schools." It was a summary of the "Wesley Guild Manual," with comments and suggestions thereon. Mr. Evans recommended all who wished to weld church and school together to read it. The growth of the Guild amongst the Wesleyan Methodists has been rapid. Summed up in one phrase, the idea or aim of the Guild is "Comradeship in the highest aims of Life." Its object is, (1) To make young Christians; (2) to make young Christians work; (3) to make young Christians work to the greatest advantage. And the results have been most gratifying; it has supplied a felt need; proved to be the missing link between Church and Sunday-school; and in many instances it has solved the problem of how to retain elder scholars. It has attracted large numbers of thoughtful young people who were scarcely touched in any other way; it has stimulated the spirit of Christian service: has put new life into old organisations; and in many instances it has produced a real revival of religion. The central principles of the movement are: (1) Spirituality. First and last, and all the way through, the Wesley Guild is a spiritual movement. It boldly appeals to the highest instincts and capacities of youth. (2) Service. The Guild has no sleeping partners. Work for all, and all at work, is one of its fundamental maxims. (3) Elasticity. It has no cast iron about it; its rules are simple and flexible. Ample room is left for local modification and development. (4) Comradeship. Banding together for mutual help, mutual enjoyment, and mutual encouragement in good endeavour. While maintaining a real and vigorous union, it develops and conserves the force of the individual. (5) Denominationalism. It is a denominational society, an organisation for the young people of a particular Church; at the same time ready to co-operate with other societies with similar aims, whenever possible. Its motto is one of Wesley's sayings: "I desire to form a league, offensive and defensive, with every soldier of Jesus Christ." The Guild is denominational. (1) Because the centre of interest for young people should be their own Church. (2) Because a strong and healthy Church loyalty is the very best foundation for broader sympathies. (3) Experience has proved that the denominational principle for such societies is the best. (4) A denominational society can deal most effectively with the organisation of departments of work, with the creation of literature, and other needs of its young people. (5) The gains to the Churches have been most striking in the case of denominational societies. There are four essentials: The Pledges, the Devotional Meeting, some definite form of active Christian service, and affiliation with the Central Guild. There are three classes of members, called Active, Companion, and Associate members. Active members are already Church members, willing and ready for Christian service, and are joined together for resolute endeavour after the best things of the Christian life. They are eligible for any office in connection with the Guild. Their watchword is Consecration. The watchword of the Companion members is Friendship. They are young people not yet members of the Church, but trained in Methodist homes, taught in Methodist schools, and attending the services, though not seeing their way to accept full responsibility of Church membership. They are eligible to serve on sectional committees. Associate members are those of older years, whom no one would or could keep out of such a movement. Their experience and kindly sympathy are valuable. Often they can render good service, though it must always be kept in mind that the Guild is a training-ground for the young. Any guild which fails to get young workers into harness misses one of its supreme aims. Mr. Evans gave many details of the work, and pleaded that there was much in this example which in our churches we should do well to follow.

To organise was not to sacrifice freedom but to take the opportunity of using it. We could not expect truths and principles to live and prosper simply on their own account. A great deal depended on the climate in which they happened to be, whether of warm fellowship or chilly isolation. "I would appeal strongly," he concluded, "for Guild Fellowship for our young people in the four ways suggested by the Wesley Guild—a Religious Service, Temperance or other Christian service, Mental Culture or Literary Evening, and a Social or Recreative Evening. But that in all of them the spirit of religion shall prevail and form the basis of all the work. Let me also appeal on behalf of Recognition Services, for they form the crowning point, and are a necessary adjunct of the Guild. They complete the scheme. We are celebrating the centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth to-day, and we have been asked to follow his example. His interest in the young, and his work for them were great. We cannot, perhaps, work on his lines, but we can work in his spirit, and we can follow one who was the greatest of all, and whose death is kept in remembrance to-day. We can follow him in our attention to the young, and thus, to some extent become his faithful followers."

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING opened the discussion. He said there was no desire to overlook the Guilds which already existed in our schools, or to displace them, but rather to enrich and stimulate them. The splendid lesson of the Wesley Guild was the value of definiteness. He advised his hearers to get a copy of the Manual for themselves. The Wesleyans know how to organise; they want success, and are not afraid to say so. Unitarians generally found that they had rather neglected the spiritual life of the scholars. Sunday-schools should be distinctly religious organisations.

Mr. JOHN DENDY said that success did not mean the mere counting of heads, but fresh converts to the kingdom of God. What was needed was the putting of the right spirit into the old institutions. They were not going to find salvation in the slavish imitation of the organisations of other denominations, but rather in arousing the spirit in which they were lacking. The fact had been growing upon him for years past that Unitarians did not sufficiently realise that there was such a thing as the spiritual life. By not recognising the line between sacred and secular, they lost sight of the sacred. The young people should come into the Sunday-school as into a sacred place, moving about in it as in the presence of God. They should come not for amusement, but to be lifted up into a higher spiritual atmosphere. They would have to admit the charge brought against them, otherwise, that they were not a spiritually minded people.

The Rev. H. B. SMITH and Messrs. JONES and WIGLEY also joined in the discussion, and a hearty vote of thanks to the Monton friends, responded to by Mr.

Broadbent, concluded the meetings, which will stand out conspicuously for their success both as regards numbers present, and, what is far more important, for the uplifting thoughts which they inspired.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Birmingham: Small Heath (Welcome Meeting).—On Friday evening, April 14, a meeting was held in the Waverley-road Church, to welcome the Rev. Wm. C. Hall, M.A., the newly appointed minister. Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, who presided, Mr. J. A. Langford, on behalf of the congregation, Mr. W. B. Matthews, on behalf of the Sunday-school, and the Rev. Joseph Wood, on behalf of brother ministers in the city, joined in offering a cordial welcome to Mr. Hall, and spoke with good hope of the future of the congregation. The Rev. J. C. Street spoke of the good work Mr. Hall had done at Ashton-under-Lyne, and the Rev. J. W. Austen and others also spoke. Mr. Hall warmly acknowledged the kindness shown to him in that welcome meeting

Bolton: Bank-street.—On Sunday morning, April 9, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall preached a sermon in commemoration of Dr. Martineau. The annual spring sermons were preached on April 16 by the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, of Monton, and the collection in aid of the chapel funds amounted to £50.

Brighton (Welcome Meeting).—On Tuesday evening, April 18, a meeting was held in the Christ Church schoolroom, when a cordial welcome was given to the Rev. Priestley Prime, the newly appointed minister, and Mrs. Prime. Mr. C. W. Mellor, J.P., presided, and among those who joined in the welcome were the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Mr. W. Slatter, a veteran member of the church, and the Rev. J. Felstead. A cordial letter of sympathy was received from Mr. G. J. Holyoake. Mr. Bowie said that they would find in Mr. Prince a thoroughly genuine, earnest, and religiously minded man. He appealed to his hearers to do all they could to help their minister to bring out the highest and best that is in him, and he reminded them that the making of a minister rests with a congregation more than they sometimes realise. In acknowledging the welcome, Mr. Prime said that he was anxious that they should build up a church with a deep religious life, with a people so intent on serving God that they would be impelled to do something towards solving the terrible social problems around them. The only effective way of solving those problems was through the moral and religious earnestness of a people who found that they must do something to help their neighbours.

Chatham.—On Tuesday evening, April 18, the closing meeting for the session of the Society for Religious Study in connection with Hamond Hill Church, took the form of reading and discussion of short papers. The work of the session has included a series of lectures on Liberal Religion by the minister, a study of Armstrong's "God and the Soul," together with papers on various subjects.

Chichester.—The Rev. C. A. Hoddinott has again been elected for three years on the Board of Guardians, of which he has already been a member for nine years. Although 78 years of age, Mr. Hoddinott is continuing his Sunday afternoon services at the "House," and retains his place on the various committees of which he is a member.

Clifton (Resignation).—The Rev. Dr. Warschauer having tendered his resignation of the pulpit of Oakfield-road Church, which he has held since 1899, owing to his acceptance of the co-pastorate of Anerley Congregational Church, jointly with the Rev. Hugh C. Wallace, the following resolution was proposed by Mr. Charles Thomas, J.P., seconded by Mr. C. Cole, and carried unanimously: "That this meeting desires to place on record its high appreciation of the services rendered to this church by Dr. Warschauer during his pastorate, and expresses its great regret that he cannot longer continue its pastor; they assure him of their affectionate love and respect, and join in good wishes for his future." Dr. Warschauer will terminate his ministry in Clifton on the last Sunday in May.

Gloucester.—A recent survey of the Barton-street Chapel showed that it was in need of immediate repairs both within and without. The external work was at once put in hand, the brick walls have been pointed, damaged parts restored, new rain-water gutters and fall pipes fixed, and other repairs executed. In addition to the above, a new lavatory, sanitary fixtures and drains have been constructed. The cost of this work has been about £110, towards which Mrs. Price, of Pen Moel, generously contributed £100. It is estimated that a further outlay of £30 to £40 will be necessary for internal repairs and decorations of the chapel, schoolroom and vestries. A special fund is being started by the congregation for this purpose.

Ilkeston and Loughborough (Appointment).—The Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Accrington, has accepted an invitation to the joint pastorate of Ilkeston and Loughborough under the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, and expects to enter upon his ministry there at the beginning of July.

London: Stratford.—The last of the series of Unitarian services for the people was held in the Town Hall, Stratford, on Sunday, April 16. The service was conducted by the Rev. John Page Hopps, who took for his subject, "Hold on by God." The attendance was again a large one, the number largely exceeding that of the previous week. Great interest has been shown in the services throughout, and the inquiries for Unitarian literature were numerous. Some 14,000 handbills, each containing a short statement of Unitarian beliefs, and about 5,000 tracts have been distributed in the neighbourhood. Special courses of sermons following upon the Town Hall services are being given at Stratford, Forest Gate, and Walthamstow.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street.—The eighteenth annual tea and sacred concert was held on Good Friday; 103 sat down to tea, after which an excellent programme was rendered by the choir and friends, the building being well filled, more than 200 being present. Mr. T. Bond presided, heartily thanking all those who had contributed in making the gathering a success, and welcomed the large gathering into their venerable sanctuary.

Raloo.—The Remonstrant Church was re-opened on April 9, after extensive repairs and renovation, effected during the past year. The service was conducted by the Rev. William Napier, who preached an impressive sermon, and the collection amounted to £23 2s. Altogether about £157 has been received towards the cost of the renovation, which has given general satisfaction. Special gifts, such as the drapery of the pulpit, have been made by individual members.

Saffron Walden.—The 68th annual tea was held in the General Baptist Chapel on Good Friday, and at 7 o'clock the tradition of this old-time gathering was changed from a public meeting to a religious service, when the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth was the preacher. On Easter Sunday the musical part of the services was conducted by the Excelsior Band, with much acceptance; Mr. Brinkworth again being the preacher.

South Wales Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meetings were held at Wick on Wednesday and Thursday, April 12 and 13. On Wednesday evening the Rev. J. P. Kane conducted the devotional service, and sermons were preached by the Revs. E. O. Jenkins (in English) and Lewis Williams (in Welsh). On Thursday evening, after an early committee meeting, the Rev. R. J. Jones conducted the service, and the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, the president, preached an English sermon on "Unitarian Christianity." In the afternoon, after devotions conducted by the Rev. J. Davies, the meeting was engaged in a commemoration of the life and teaching of Dr. Martineau. The Rev. R. J. Jones delivered an address in English, and the Rev. W. James, as an old pupil of Martineau's, spoke with much insight and deep feeling. At the evening meeting the service was conducted by the Rev. W. James, and sermons were preached by the Revs. Simon Jones (in English) and John Davies (in Welsh). Regret was expressed that a pilgrimage had not been arranged to Trefleming, the home of "Jolo Morganwg," the great Unitarian hymn writer, which is within a few miles of the chapel. It was also suggested that if the meetings were held a day earlier in the week the attendance of ministers might be maintained better to the close.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MEMBERS of our churches in London and the South-Eastern Counties are asked to note that May 14 is "Assembly Sunday," when collections in aid of the work of the Provincial Assembly are to be made. The main object of the Assembly—the bringing together of the scattered churches into a closer brotherhood, whereby the stronger may know and help the weaker—has been kept steadily in view. It is essential, as this work is increasing year by year, that its progress and development shall be maintained, and not retarded by the lack of financial support. Hearty and generous support is invited from all who are interested in the welfare of the churches.

TUESDAY next is the centenary of Schiller's death. On the significance of the national celebration which will take place throughout Germany, and especially on the connection of the great poet with Jena, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones writes in another column.

A REVIEW of Mr. Carpenter's new book on Dr. Martineau, in the Manchester Guardian of May 2, signed by the well-known initials of Professor A. S. Wilkinson, concludes as follows:—"But the work of Dr. Martineau will not be measured by the extent to which his philosophical system finds implicit assent, and still less by the degree to which he may prove to have forecast the ultimate results of critical science. It is his life-long witness to the loftiest ideals, his absolutely fearless pursuit of the truth as he saw it, and the depth of his personal influence over minds of the highest type which give him a claim to be long remembered. For what Mr. Carpenter has done, entirely in the spirit of his subject, to help towards this we owe him hearty thanks."

A GREAT step of progress has been made in Russia during the past week, unless indeed it should prove again to be only a paper reform. The Tsar has signed a decree granting to his subjects liberty of conscience in the matter of religion (with the exception, unhappily, of Jews and Armenians). Now it is no longer penal to be a Dissenter, Stundists will be no longer sent to Siberia, and the tide of emigration to free countries may be stayed; Roman Catholics will no longer be forced into nominal adhesion to the Orthodox Church, and even Mahomedan and Buddhist subjects of Russia are to be respected. Millions of the Tsar's subjects are liberated, by a stroke of his pen, from a condition of barbarous subjection, the existence of which at the present day it was difficult for the people of a Western country to realise.

THE Bishop of Norwich is a strong believer in the value of the so-called Athanasian Creed. In his recent address at the Diocesan Conference he said he hoped to be permitted to oppose steadfastly every proposition to alter the existing usage, and mainly for three reasons:—

"(1) I am quite sure that the mass of the "people, if they have an accurate know-"ledge of the two fundamental verities of "the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation, "have obtained it mainly, probably "almost entirely, from the Quicunque "Vult. If it were merely placed as a "venerable document in the Prayer-book, "it would be no better known by our "laity, if as well known, as the Thirty-"nine Articles; and this would be to the "advantage of Unitarian error. (2) I "do not at all believe that you can "draw such a clear, definite, and in-"telligible line between the minatory "clauses of the New Testament (e.g., St. "John iii. 18, 36; St. Mark xvi. 16; 2 "John 9-11) and the minatory clauses of "the Creed as will encourage the people "to believe and retain the former "while you teach them to repudiate "the latter. The open rejection of the "one would be followed by the tacit "rejection of the other. (3) At a time "like the present, in which the funda-"mental truths of the Gospel are being "rudely assailed, and doubted, or denied, "alas! by some who hold positions in the "the Church, the degradation of the "Creed as proposed would have dis-"astrous results, for the masses of the "people would inevitably draw one of two "conclusions—either (1) that the Chris-"tian dogmas of the Holy Trinity and "the Incarnation are not true; or (2) "that, though possibly true, they are not "vital, and therefore need not really be "believed."

The Bishop evidently will have no sympathy with those Churchmen to whom Dr. Drummond alluded in his speech at Oxford on Tuesday afternoon, who are pleading for countenance in high places of a reverent and open-minded treatment of all critical questions in the study of the Bible.

WE are indebted to the Christian World for projecting a useful series of illustrated articles, the first of which appeared in the issue of last week. The subject is the village institute, the writer, Sylvester Horne, and plans, together with an attractive elevation, are supplied by P. Morley Horder. The architect estimates the cost of a one-story building at £600, or a two-storied one at £800. The larger building would contain a hall capable of seating 120 people, and either scheme would allow for a billiard-room and a refreshment bar. Mr. Horne calculates that the institute might prove self-supporting, i.e., it might pay all expenses of upkeep and interest on capital. The estimate may be a little sanguine, but clearly the cost need be only slight. What is required is initiative. Mr. Horne thinks the founding of such institutes in villages and small towns would be best undertaken by a church. We ourselves are inclined to believe it would be best done by the village or town community. But certainly there is here a thing that needs doing. We cordially recommend the article to all those who are concerned in alleviating the ennui of leisure in the country districts on winter evenings. Now is the time for decision and for action if anything is to be effected by the time of the next falling of the leaves.

THE town of Huddersfield is likely to reap the advantage of a valuable scheme put forth by its Mayor, Mr. Alderman Broadbent, and Dr. G. S. Moore, its Medical Officer of Health. The proposals, which have for their aim to lessen the shockingly high and quite unnecessary infant mortality, are in line with, and perhaps owe something to, the Manchester system of Corporation health missionaries.

The outline of the new policy includes "the payment of a shilling to the person bringing information of birth, provided it be given within 48 hours." The visitation of the mothers by lady workers qualified to give practical advice as to the care of infants, and the establishment of a crèche for the children of women in the factories, and depôts for the supply of milk, and a system of health inspection by lady inspectors of houses and factories where women are employed.

We have here the skeleton of valuable social enterprise. It is matter of regret that the Corporation is at present indisposed to incur the small, necessary cost of the whole undertaking, and that for a time it may be more dependent than is advisable on private subscriptions. But regret gives place to satisfaction when we reflect on the ideal of mayoral responsibility here suggested. The connection of the chief officers of the Corporation with the enterprise is also a guarantee that the question will be regarded broadly, as it affects the whole community. This wanton mischief which we have long suffered with so foolish an equanimity is one of those to which particular attention was drawn in that remarkable document, the inter-departmental report on physical deterioration. We trust to see the action of Huddersfield extensively imitated and enlarged upon in the near future.

SCHILLER AND JENA.

On May 9, town and village throughout Germany will commemorate with enthusiasm the centenary of the death of Schiller. This enthusiasm has been engendered from various causes. On the one hand it is the outcome of reflection on the philosophy and poetry of Schiller and the need of his teaching for our modern times, and on the other hand it is intuitive feeling pervading those who have not read his words deeply, but through tradition and the presence amongst them of a certain "atmosphere" have learnt to honour and to love one of the creators of their modern Fatherland. As regards the former class, it may be truly stated that the works of Goethe and Schiller have left a deeper influence upon Germany than even the philosophy of Kant.

Kant's philosophy although it deals with the fundamental problems of life and destiny, yet deals with them from a plane in which reason must ever be on the alert in order to understand its meaning.

Certainly such a dealing with the great questions of life and religion has incalculable value, but it is a value which can only become the possession of a few.

But in Schiller's writings it is otherwise. All his metaphysical work, in so far as there is metaphysic in his work, has a direct bearing on the needs and aspirations of the human heart. Everything turns around life as it is and as it should be. The secret of life is not to be found in any transcendental idealism or explanation of categories, but in moulding the principle of life which each man carries within his own breast. Body and soul are not two different elements which make up life, and between which there is a deep dualism necessary to be held. The body and its functions when properly directed help to the development of the mind and spirit. Schiller finds the truest development of life to consist then not so much in any mental conceptions and abstract speculations but in Art. Art he conceived as a vital power which was able to bring into harmony all the instincts and tendencies of man. It is from this artistic point of view that he perceives the whole of life. Art is the beginning, the middle, and the end of the spiritual life. The elements of religion are not to be found in metaphysical and mathematical conclusions, nor in a certain spot in the human mind or spirit; true religion consists in the whole man dwelling upon the whole of nature and of existence. Force, harmony, beauty are thus implanted in the life. Life becomes a contemplation of the beautiful. The process of analysing and dissecting is passed, and man stands on a summit viewing his inheritance. Life, certainly, can not always be lived at this level; the work of the world demands analysis, lopping, and dissection, but man will be ever more equipped to accomplish that work if he has been on the mount of harmony and beauty. And every piece of analytic work will enter into this wholeness of the nature, and man the next time he climbs the mountain has a richer inheritance than before.

Schiller's short but fruitful life was devoted to showing this idealism of moral beauty as the one thing needful for his country. The days he wrote were days of terrible darkness in the land. Napoleon was becoming the terror of Europe, and no land suffered more than Germany from his greed. To hold up an idealism of moral beauty as a bright star in an otherwise black night could only have been accomplished by a spirit who knew from the depth of his own soul the validity of the truth he taught. No power on earth could rob the nation of this inheritance which Schiller offered them. There were dark days in store for the nation at least for ten years after Schiller's death, but Fichte followed Schiller and preached a similar gospel when the cloud was darkest over the land.

It is no wonder, therefore, that there will be the utmost enthusiasm throughout the land on May 9. And nowhere, I am sure, will that enthusiasm be more genuine than in the ancient university town of Jena. Schiller was bound to Jena by many ties of affection. The natural surroundings drew him to Jena. The rich valley on both sides of the river Saale with the mountains running for miles down the river with such ancient castles as Kunitz and Dornburg on their heights would naturally attract a spirit like his. The university was at the zenith of its glory when he was there. Tradition has it that there were two thousand students in Jena when Schiller was Professor of History, and there could not have been many more than two thousand inhabitants in the town at the time.

Jena to-day is not what it was in Schiller's time. Two lines of railways run through it; the electric trams have entered the place; large villas have been built for miles around, and the population has increased to nearly 25,000. And yet in spite of these incursions it remains an old-world place. The old university buildings are still intact, and services are held on Sundays in the university church. The old houses are inhabited, and we can shake hands from opposite windows. Many are the reminiscences of Schiller. The house where he lectured is marked by the usual tablet, and the house where he lived stands in a beautiful little garden called Schiller's garden. It is a one-story house with four or five rooms. At one end of the garden the observatory of the university has been built. Close by this a stone is fixed in the wall, and on it is the inscription "Here Schiller wrote his Wallenstein." A few yards away is an old stone table—the very table at which Goethe and Schiller used to drink their beer and talk over the problems of human life and destiny. Above the table on a piece of wood is written a quotation from Goethe's "Conversations with Eckermann," dated 1827. "Hier hat Schiller gewohnt. An diesem alten Steintisch haben wir oft gesessen und manches gute und grosse Wort mit einander gewechselt."

On the other side of the river is the village of Wenigen-Jena with its little Schiller church. A tablet makes known the fact that there Schiller was married, and the story has for generations been circulated in Jena that he was too poor to be married in the town church. Schiller was so attracted to the place that in a letter to the Grand Duke Carl August he once wrote: "There is to me no place in Germany what Jena and its neighbourhood is, for I am convinced that nowhere can one get so true and reasonable a freedom and in so small a place meet so many illustrious men."

The same thing may be said in a large measure of the little town to-day. Men of world-renown are to be found on the teaching staff, and you meet them every day. With over a hundred professors and over a thousand students in such a small town, it is evident that the whole atmosphere is full of the spirit of learning. This spirit will find expression in the meetings which are to be held on May 9, and the students and the inhabitants will be called again to carry forth the teaching and the spirit of Schiller into the materialism of this twentieth century, for nothing is more needful to-day than to present an ideal view of life—a view in which all can participate, and in which all can contribute something of value to the creation of a higher and nobler future in our Western world.

W. Tudor Jones.

The education of God is no easy business to go through; to choose the best and cling to it, is often to choose calamity on earth. But calamity which falls on a heart thrilling with God, alive to truth, conscious of good and loving it above all things, has no misery in it. It needs patience, endurance, courage, but below the surface, in the depths of the soul, there is a fountain of eternal joy. With uplifted hearts, we, children of God and partakers of His revelation, say to ourselves in hours when the heart of life beats faint and low: "Sons of God, let us walk worthy of our high vocation; our hopes shall never be ashamed; God and we shall wholly be at one."—Stopford A. Brooke.

LIVING COMMUNION WITH GOD.

A SERMON IN MEMORY OF DR. MARTINEAU.

By the Rev. James Drummond, LL.D., D.Litt.*

Ephesians iv. 6: "One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all."

Of all the influences which one man exerts over another, that which goes deepest, and awakens the most heartfelt gratitude, is religion. Men may imagine that they are indifferent to the claims of religion, and may through long periods of their lives actually be so; and yet in the hidden depths there is an inarticulate cry for God, and a seeking for some stable substance amid the fleeting shadows of the world. The doubts and tremblings of the present day tell of indestructible wants; a horror of great darkness, while men look upon fading glories; an aspiration to soar beyond the clouds of ancient thought, and catch larger visions of the undying Spirit. And when a man appears who can speak a word of religious power, touching the callous heart and giving it a new sensibility, breaking down the obstacles which hinder the progress of aspiring thought, and casting a strengthening spell of sympathy over minds already convinced, in a word, drawing aside some obscuring veil, and giving a clearer vision of God, that man is revered as one who has brought strength and healing to the hungry soul, and shown it the true way to the eternal home. It is this mighty influence which has drawn to Christ the devoted love of men; it is this which has compelled the reverence that is paid to the memory of saints; it is this which turns the admiration which we accord to a great thinker into the homage which we yield only to the seer and prophet.

It is that we may express our gratitude towards a great religious teacher, who for so many years was the strength and ornament of this college, that we have met together to-day. But before I attempt to give some expression to the feelings which this centenary calls forth I must refer for a moment to the earnest and faithful man, who according to our original hope, was to have addressed us this evening, and who would have spoken out of the fulness of his own rich experience of Dr. Martineau's influence. Mr. Armstrong mingled freely in the great battle of life, and was always a fearless champion of righteousness and truth. It matters not now whether his judgments were always correct; no one, I think, can fail to admire the noble sincerity, the absolute unselfishness, and the dauntless firmness, with which he opposed his whole strength to what he believed to be wrong. And his labour was not in vain. Before he was called away he was allowed to see some of the blessed fruits of his self-denying toil. The secret of his power was his perfect faith in God. He walked as in an open vision of the unseen and eternal, and the reality and the nearness of God were the substance of the message which he delivered to his brethren. Many through his word have passed out of darkness into light, and his memory is worthily coupled to-day with that of him at whose feet he had sat, and whose teaching he so beautifully interpreted.

One of the first things that strike one in looking back on the career of Dr. Martineau is the extent and variety of his powers. His aesthetic, his intellectual, his practical, and his spiritual gifts were all of a high order; and apart from their intrinsic excellence, when taken one by one, their harmonious combination in a single person marked him out as an exceptional man. It is seldom that manual skill, with a taste for engineering, fondness for mathematics and physical science, linguistic attainments, severity of thought, fearlessness of criticism, splendour of style, devoutness of worship, and power of spiritual appeal, are found united in one person; and this richness of endowment gives him a distinction of a very rare kind, and no doubt contributed largely to the fascination which he exercised over so many of his pupils, divided as they were from one another in taste and temperament, but joined in their common veneration for a man whose greatness all alike felt and acknowledged. If in this wide range of faculties we seek for the dominant note, it is that which it is most suitable to dwell upon in this place, religion.

Notwithstanding the originality and independence of his mind he remained through life attached to that body of Christians among whom he had been born, and from whom he received his earliest religious impressions. It could not be otherwise; for however he may have longed at times for a wider communion, however he may sometimes have sought in other denominations a spiritual fervour which he felt to be lacking in his own, the Unitarians were the only religious people who would tolerate his heresies; and though he is sometimes referred to as one of the greatest religious teachers of the nineteenth century, this great prophetic soul had no opportunity of speech except in that despised body which for more than two hundred years has insisted that the word of God shall not be bound. The genuine devoutness and faith of the Unitarians who were prominent a century ago cannot be doubted; but as young Martineau's genius expanded, he began to long for deeper thought and more kindling expression than he found among those with whom he was most closely associated. His description of the Unitarians of Coleridge's early days is probably drawn from his own experience. They were "a people eminently practical and prosaic, impatient of romance, indifferent to intellectual refinements, strict in their moral expectations, scrupulous of the veracities but afraid of the fervours of devotion." To his own ardent spirit this type of mind was never congenial. The sense of sin, aspirations after the perfect holiness of a divine communion, and spiritual intuition into the deep things of God, began to assert their authority, and to carry him away into new regions of thought and life. The crisis came after the death of his friend, Henry Turner, which fell upon him as "a sudden flash and stroke of sorrow." As he himself relates, "the scales fell from his eyes, and the realities and solemnities of life first came upon him. . . . He well remembered, under the fervour of the first enthusiasm, how the voices that sounded in our various places of worship appeared to him to be beneath the exigencies of the case—too sober and too cold; and amid the broken light of an immature judgment he thought there ought to be some stronger and more spiritual ministry, that should less depend upon our self-help, but should take us off our feet, and fling us into a diviner life than that which prevailed among us." So the deep full flood of religious insight and emotion poured its waters of eternal life into his soul, and that time of revelation affected all his future years, inspiring the lofty thought of his mature manhood, and shedding a tranquil light over his declining days. It was a revelation of God, converting his religion from a belief, resting on the authority of others, into an immediate faith, rooted in his own experience. Late in life, as he looked back upon his long career, he wrote—"In youth, if ever we receive a 'Serious Call,' it is the most elementary religious truths by which the mind becomes entranced. Who can ever forget the intense and lofty years when first the real communion of the living God—the same God that received the cries of Gethsemane and Calvary—and the Sanctity of the inward Law, and the sublime contents of life on both sides of death, broke in a flood of glory upon his mind, and spread the world before him, stripped of his surface illusions, and with its diviner essence cleared? The restless intellect of mid-life may toss these things about in speculation, may add to them or take from them, and weave them into the artificial texture of a system. But in old age, as the end draws near, we repose again on these simple truths and trusts, only with a fuller inward witness and more spiritual calm. And so the evening light is as the morning's, and sheds once more the tenderest beauty on the world."

This living faith in God was, then, the dominant energy of his life, forming the root of all his holiest affections, suggesting the highest problems of his philosophy, and dictating his message to mankind. Hear once more his own declaration, made in one of those rare moments when he consciously drew aside the veil from his own inmost being:—"The one deep faith, then, which has determined my whole word and work among you, is in The Living Union of God with our Humanity . . . . We pine as prisoners, till we burst into the air of that supernatural life which He lives eternally; we are parched with a holy thirst, till we find contact with the running waters of his quick affection. Him immediately, Him in person, Him in whispers of the day, and eye to eye by night; Him for a close refuge in temptation, not as a large thought of ours but as an Almightiness in Himself; Him ready with his moistening dews for the dry heart, and his breathings of hope for the sorrowing; Him always and everywhere living for our holy trust, do we absolutely need for our repose, and wildly wander till we find. . . . Those simple faiths that come we know not whence, those dim suspicions of conscience that creep upon us with authoritative awe, that mysterious sense of an over-arching infinitude, pierced with bursts of light when the clouds of our lower mind clear off—nay, the common promptings of disinterested love, the call to self-sacrifice, the reverence for nobleness and beauty, what are they but the awakening touch of God's indwelling life, the movement of his Spirit among the trembling strings? To the private soul, he thus reveals himself in its highest spontaneous affections, ever adding another grace and further insight to those who will be faithful with the first. To our collective humanity he comes in that great consent of spirits which arises in the presence of true heroism or sanctity, and constitutes the tendency of an age and the ultimate forces of history. Through all our natural life, individual and social, is the supernatural interfused, and the ideal colours of heaven are spread through the substance of our experience, to transfigure it.''

The revelation of God which thus dawned with such ineffaceable colours on his mind included his ''relation to the beauty of holiness,'' and a sense of divine love calling forth an answering love; but it assumed, if I am not mistaken, its brightest radiance within his conscience. It was there that he found the '' objective and supernatural authority '' which alone deserved the name of religious. To him the moral law presented itself with an overwhelming majesty. It was no subjective caprice, no changeable æsthetic taste, no prudential calculation of utilities, but spake with sovereign voice to the hushed and listening worlds, and breathed its eternal mandate in the sanctuary of adoring reverence. He felt, with Hooker, that '' Of law there can be no less acknowledged, than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admire her as the mother of their peace and joy.'' Thus, it was in the moral intuitions that he found the most immediate and intimate communion with God, '' person with person,'' '' spirit with spirit.'' To do the will of Him that sent him, that will which, with its universal laws, has its particular message for each, and speaks in articulate tones to every conscience that will hear—this was his unceasing aspiration, and the prevailing effort of his life.

If our exposition ended here, it might seem as though Dr. Martineau were an extreme individualist, walking in his own solitary communion with God, and needing none to point the way, or quicken the pulses of his endeavour. But he emphatically disclaimed the character of an individualist. He recognised the necessity of corporate life for the development of man's highest powers, and, while perceiving that every man had his own lonely problems, his separate responsibility, and his secret worship, he felt the mutual influence of soul on soul, and the kindling fervour of common aspiration and prayer. He was repelled by the '' excessive individualism of Protestant piety, sequestering the private mind with God, and abandoning Society and States to the secular expediencies ''; and he embraced the higher view '' that our humanity is one vast organism, at once the object and the medium of a Divine and holy purpose.'' His thought, as we are aware, never ceased to grow, but its great determining lines were drawn with a firm hand at a comparatively early period, and they only cleared into more simple and secure expression as the years went by. In his ministry at Hope-street he taught that we had not framed our religion in solitude, but had received it as an inheritance from the past; that human nature was, as it were, recreated in Christ; that his was the type of character to which we aspired, and that therefore we were members of one great whole, dependent on one another, and all in common dependent on Christ as their head. After his keen criticism of the Gospels, and his rejection of mythological elements which disfigured the popular Christianity, he held firmly the same leading thought. As criticism pursued its task of separating the fictitious or the mistaken from the true, the figure of Christ seemed to him to stand forth in more glorious beauty, and the Christian type of character commanded to the last his supreme homage. Christ was still to him the Uplifter and Inspirer, not through the bestowal of something other than immediate revelation, but by '' making us more aware of it and helping us to interpret it.'' For often we are heedless '' till we see in another the victory which shames our own defeat, and are caught up by enthusiasm for some realised heroism or sanctity.'' And so '' Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life,'' and '' he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion between man and God.''

It is now apparent that a profound religious experience lay at the root of Dr. Martineau's thought. It is not only as a religious teacher, but as a thinker, that he is celebrated, and the question may arise why he ever passed from the one character into the other. It is, I think, a complete misconception to suppose that his religion rested mainly on an intellectual basis, and was defective in spontaneous inspiration and poetry. He himself never admitted that faith depended on a well instructed intellect. It had a source of its own in native and ultimate trusts, which might indeed be disturbed but could not be created, by purely intellectual judgments. '' We may touch,'' he once said, '' a sense which had never revealed itself before; we may begin a low, sweet music, at which the sleeping soul may turn with wondering face, and gently cross the bridge of dreams, and open at length the living eye, and say, 'what a world is this, and wherefore am I here?' : : : : I have known from myself, and have felt for others, that when once we have descended to the true springs of devotion in our nature, doubts and fears spontaneously clear away.'' And again he says, '' I believe the general fact to be that Feeling goes before Idea. Wherever the fresh forces of our nature are at work upon Divine things—or, as I would rather say, wherever God's spirit is moving in the soul—there is a dim and solemn feeling of our way out of darkness into light, and the season of deepest faith and worship is prior to the analysis of notions and determination of creed.''

The springs of devotion in him, however, were combined with an intellect of unusual force and subtlety, and his impulse towards philosophical speculation was not to be repressed. While religion had its own peculiar visions, it nevertheless extended its gaze over every department of nature and life, and while its elementary trusts might be sufficient to sustain devout and virtuous character in pure souls which felt no need of metaphysics, the thinker was obliged to interpret and justify his intuitions, to find a place for his spiritual convictions within the framework of a rational system, and so '' to aim at the hearty and complete reconciliation of philosophic thought and holy faith.'' I once heard a remark somewhat scornfully made, after one of his vindications of theistic faith, that it was the last effort of Scholasticism. It is not a mark of profundity to express contempt for one of the great movements of human thought, and, though there was an element of truth in the remark, it overlooked a very important distinction. Dr. Martineau and the Scholastics both aimed at justifying the data of faith before the bar of reason; but whereas the latter assumed as their data the authoritative dogmas of a Church, which were already the intellectual interpretations of a more primitive and spiritual experience, Dr. Martineau went direct to the fountains of faith in the human heart, and endeavoured to draw thence the primary and uncorrupted data of man's spiritual being, and to show that these were in accordance with the facts of science and with the highest speculative thought. In this he rendered an important service by recalling philosophy to its highest tasks. He felt that our spiritual life was, to say the least, just as real and just as trustworthy as our physical, and showed that no philosophy could be satisfactory which ignored this transcendent element, and based itself on a lopsided and reduced humanity.

The last remark indicates another reason for the philosophical formulation of he, faith. The intellect, if it cannot creatie can undermine and destroy faith. This corrosive action is indirect. The ultimats data of faith are inevitably associated with a vast multitude of beliefs, which are not its immediate expression, but intellectual forms in which it has found a prolonged, but nevertheless temporary, abode. These forms which the intellect has created the intellect can destroy; and then faith goes forth a homeless wanderer, starved and cold in the winter of agonizing doubt. Now, Dr. Martineau lived through a period when this dissolution of intellectual forms was proceeding with unexampled speed, and men gazed in despair on the ruins, and looked with vain yearning for the temple of their worship, which had vanished like a golden dream in the hard, prosaic dawn of rising knowledge. Then it was his task to show them through the dust of crumbling walls and the bewildering glare of unfamiliar lights that the ethereal shrine might still be seen in all its glorious beauty, and that the ultimate postulates of faith remained on immovable foundations. That in this way he rendered incalculable service, and that far from being a destructive critic, as some with little insight have imagined, he was a "repairer of the breach, a restorer of paths to dwell in," is the glad testimony of many who recovered through him their spiritual outlook upon life.

And now we must ask in conclusion, what is the special legacy which he has bequeathed to our College? Not so much an organised system of thought, however valuable that may be, as a spirit of life, which lay deeper than all thought, and brought him into immediate contact with divine realities. He has taught us to seek, through direct communion with God, the consecration of all our studies, so that we may search for truth in simple trust, with an independence of mind which will bow to no idols of the mob, and nevertheless is controlled and chastened by wide sympathies and reverent admirations. Beginning as a student his almost life-long connection with the College, he found in Mr. Wellbeloved and the teachers associated with him that entire respect for the rights of individual conscience and thought by which it has always been distinguished; and with rare clearness and power he showed how this respect rested on the deep foundations of the soul's immediate communion with God, and far from manifesting indifference to truth was the essential condition of spiritual veracity, which alone could fill with life-giving energy the empty forms of thought. As Professor of the College he was associated with a man whom, on this centenary, we would not willingly forget, his beloved friend, John James Tayler. The two men were different in gift and temperament, but yet were so like-minded in their most settled principles and convictions, that each strengthened the spirtual impression made by the other, and those who were pupils of each cannot but combine them in the same grateful memories. May the spirit of these two men long remain in our College, and our veneration for our departed saints lift us nearer to the level of their lofty ideals. And may this, our memorial of the eager student, the faithful minister, the wise and gracious teacher, help to revive our fading impressions, and bring us through a holy imagination to hear his voice once more, and feel the spell of all that was highest in the thought and noblest in the character of James Martineau.

Without this mood of contemplative oneness with God, this genial melting of our life in his, there may be in us no want of masculine sense and energy of clear truth and honour, of faithful constancy under temptation; but there will also be a Jewish hardness and narrowness of mind, a dry unmellowed temper, an egotistic and critical irreverence for all that will not submit to our survey. If aspiration is not to die out from our religion, if affection and self-oblivion are not to fly away and leave it empty of all diviner habitant—if the love of God, as a passion and a power, is not to be insultingly dismissed among the romances of the past, we must open a more hospitable heart to the gospel of the Spirit, and more deeply enter into the life of the living God.—Martineau.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

"It is the best thing since Coleridge," so a friend wrote to me the other day; and those who have read Professor Bradley's "Shakespearean Tragedy" with the care it deserves will be inclined to agree with the remark. In the flood of perfunctory literary criticism it is refreshing to come across a book, which bears upon it the evidence of profound knowledge and meditation, and is so remarkably free from personal dogmatism and critical conceits. The element of temperament can never be eliminated entirely from the work of interpretation, and there are writers whose criticism resolves itself simply into a study of their own moods. From this sentimental and narrowly introspective school Professor Bradley stands poles asunder. No judgment of his book could be more ludicrously unfair than to speak of it as Shakespeare viewed through Mr. Bradley's temperament. It is the work of a catholic intelligence, which through long study and discipline has purged itself of self-sufficiency and caprice. Alike in mental grasp and ethical insight, and in the singular elevation of its style it belongs to the small body of English criticism, which is universal rather than personal. Certainly the chair of poetry at Oxford has never justified itself more signally than in this book.

Many readers will be grateful to Professor Bradley for his rigid avoidance of the didactic vein. He does not set himself to explain what Shakespeare meant to teach, or to look for deep waters in shallow pools. "It is very possible," he warns us, "to look for subtlety in the wrong places in Shakespeare, but in the right places it is not possible to find too much." Equally illuminating are many of the remarks scattered through his exposition concerning religion in the plays. "The "Elizabethan drama," he writes, "was "almost wholly secular; and while Shake-"speare was writing he practically confined "his view to the world of non-theological "observation and thought, so that he "represents it substantially in one and the "same way whether the period of the story "is pre-Christian or Christian. He looked "at this 'secular' world most intently "and seriously; and he painted it, we "cannot but conclude, with entire fidelity, "without the wish to enforce an opinion of "his own, and, in essentials, without regard "to anyone's hopes, fears, or beliefs." "Shakespeare," he says elsewhere, "was "not attempting to justify the ways of "God to men, or to show the universe as "a Divine Comedy." Of course, this is only another way of saying that Shakespeare was dramatic to his finger-tips, and had profound insight into the essential meaning of tragedy. It is this conception, firmly grasped and never forgotten, which makes Professor Bradley's criticism so illuminating. Again and again he reminds us of the importance of attending to the acting tradition in the explanation of crucial difficulties. "Shakespeare wrote primarily for the "theatre and not for students, and there-"fore great weight should be attached to "the immediate impression made by his "works."

It is not easy to describe in a few words the moral insight and the closeness of observation which make Professor Bradley's analyses of character so vivid and suggestive, or to detach passages for quotation from the closely woven texture of the book. What could be better than this picture of the Queen in Hamlet? "She had a soft animal nature, and was very dull and very shallow. She loved to be happy like a sheep in the sun; and, to do her justice, it pleased her to see others happy, like more sheep in the sun. . . . The belief at the bottom of her heart was that the world is a place constructed simply that people may be happy in it in a good-humoured sensual fashion. Her only chance was to be made unhappy. When affliction comes to her, the good in her nature struggles to the surface through the heavy mass of sloth. Like other faulty characters in Shakespeare's tragedies, she dies a better woman than she had lived."

Here, again, is a description of the character of Cordelia: "She speaks—it is "hard to believe it—scarcely more than "a hundred lines; and yet no character "in Shakespeare is more absolutely indi-"vidual or more ineffaceably stamped on "the memory of his readers. There is a "harmony, strange but perhaps the "result of intention, between the cha-"racter itself and this reserved or par-"simonious method of depicting it. An "expressiveness almost inexhaustible "gained through paucity of expression; "the suggestion of infinite wealth and "beauty conveyed by the very refusal to "reveal this beauty in expansive speech "—this is at once the nature of Cordelia "herself and the chief characteristic of "Shakespeare's art in representing it."

Sentences like these, so full of subtle beauty and suggestiveness, can hardly fail to whet even the most fastidious literary appetite and to win readers for a book which contains similar treasure in prodigal abundance.

A new series of biographies of literary men needs considerable justification. For this reason Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton are to be congratulated upon their good fortune in being able to include two such notable studies as Dr. Barry's "Newman" and Mr. Gosse's "Coventry Patmore" among the early volumes of "Literary Lives." Patmore's Memoirs and Correspondence were edited by Mr. Basil Champneys and published in two bulky volumes in 1900. Only a few ardent admirers are likely to wish to possess them, or to turn to them again now that they have had their season. Coventry Patmore, both as a poet and a man, was a unique figure, but the interest he excited was hardly wide enough for such a large canvas. For this reason the short study by Mr. Gosse has a distinct value, and is likely to remain as the best critical account of the man and his work. It is distinguished, moreover, by high literary merit of its own. It is written with admirable candour and delicacy of insight; and it has at the same time the needful touch of enthusiasm and personal intimacy.

Never was the popular conception of a poet, based upon the prevailing note of his poetry, more hopelessly at variance with reality than in the case of Coventry Patmore. The placid domesticity and rather cloying sweetness of the "Angel in the House" found no place in his strange and forceful personality. He was dogmatic, self-assertive, fond of exaggeration. Fortunate above most men in his friends, he managed to quarrel with nearly all of them. Mr. Gosse, in one of his most candid passages, confesses that at their first meeting he made a highly disagreeable impression upon himself. An intellectual aristocrat through and through, he had a strong sense of human inequality. He reminds us continually how close intellectual pride is to barbarism. A man can never be a pleasant person—at least to people of a smaller breed—who is "irresistibly conscious," as Mr. Gosse puts it, "of a sort of supernatural superiority in himself."

Perhaps all this was only the rather serious defect of his qualities. A "militant hermit of the soil" cannot help being conscious of isolation, and he must be tempted sometimes to thrust his isolation upon the attention of others. It is the armour wherewith he guards his interior privacy. That men immersed in the common toil of the world doubt his visions and call his language unmeaning, makes no difference to him, for it cannot dim the sense of divine illumination out of which he speaks. Patmore was a mystic of the most uncompromising order. He stands in the same line of descent as Richard Crashaw, and in his odes he has contributed to our rather severely Protestant literature a body of poetry, which is deeply tinged with Catholic mysticism. If his personality challenges criticism rather than admiration, his poetry is likely to survive popular neglect. But his fame will rest upon the Odes and not upon the "Angel in the House." The latter was at one time an effective competitor with Tennyson in the public regard. Perhaps it has suffered an undeserved eclipse owing to the quips and cranks of the critics, who sit for most of us on their Olympus as a sort of final court of poetical appeal. Poetry, like dress, has its fashions; but in the case of Patmore it is something more than fashion, which will place his short lyrics and the Odes above the larger bulk of his narrative poetry as his best achievement.

Mr. Gosse's pages contain many pleasant glimpses of Tennyson, Rossetti, and Ruskin, and more than one good story. Here is Patmore's own account of a youthful visit which he paid to Leigh Hunt:—"I set "off with a letter from my father, an old "friend of the poet, informing him of my "ambition to see him. Arriving at his "house, a very small one in a small square "somewhere in the extreme West, after a "walk of some five or six miles, I was "informed that the poet was at home, "and asked to sit down till he came to "me. This he did after I had waited in "the parlour at least two hours, when the "door was opened, and a most picturesque "gentleman, with hair flowing nearly or "quite to his shoulders, a beautiful velvet "coat and a Vandyke collar of lace about "a foot deep, appeared, rubbing his hands "and smiling ethereally, and saying, with-"out a word of preface or notice of my "having waited so long, 'This is a beau-"tiful world, Mr. Patmore!' I was so "struck by this remark that it has eclipsed "all memory of what occurred during "the remainder of my visit." The story hardly needs any comment except perhaps this, that there are few things so unpleasant in their weakness as the foppery of sentimental optimism. Pessimism and the east wind are a great deal easier to forgive. W. H. D.

SHORT NOTICES.

AMONG the books we have recently received are the following:—

The Licensing Act, 1904, with rules critically examined and explained, by Charles L. Rothera, B.A., Solicitor and Secretary of the Licensing Laws Information Bureau, uniform with Mr. Rothera's previous work, "A Practical Guide to the Licensing Act, 1902." (Jordan & Sons, Chancery-lane, W.C. 3s. 6d. net.)

Democracy and Reaction, by L. T. Hobhouse, author of "The Labour Movement," "Mind in Evolution," &c. The book noticed by John Morley in the March Nineteenth Century and After. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.)

So long as we regard the Bible as a mere external authority, intended to give us a knowledge of religion without our having the trouble of being spiritual, it will bring no holy message, no true revelation to our minds.—James Drummond.

IN THE ACADEMY.

FOR a wonder the biggest picture in this year's Academy is also the most interesting and striking, at least in the modest judgment of one observer, and that is No. 358, Herkomer's "Communal Sitting of the Burghers of Landsberg, Bavaria." It reminds one in its conception of the famous municipal portrait groups of Franz Hals, to be seen at Haarlem and elsewhere, though Herkomer's picture in its execution has, of course, a distinctive character of its own. It cannot be less than 24 feet in width and 10 feet in height, and represents the Council sitting about a long table, while the President stands in the centre speaking on some point of business. At the back one looks out through open windows upon the little town. The variety and marked individuality of the members furnish a fascinating study of what are doubtless a series of capital portraits.

Of the other larger pictures in this exhibition—which is not so dispiriting as some of recent years have been—the three prominent royalties will attract their accustomed measure of attention. But the two of most general human interest are No. 515, the hunting group by the late Charles W. Furse, A., the loss of whose high promise to British art is keenly felt, and No. 492, the "Grasmere rush-bearing," by Frank Bramley, A. Pictures of more ambitious ideal aim there are; but, while the form is there, not one of them appears to have grasped the true spirit of the scene. Thus there is a somewhat theatrical crucifiction by Sigismund Goetze (No. 213), an "Easter Morn," by Herbert A. Olivier (No. 709), in which the light and the flowers are beautiful, and "The Mount of Temptation," by Herbert Schmalz (No. 827). Among the failures we should put "The Ideal," by Frank Dicksee, R.A. (No. 15). It is doubtless a fine study of the nude, and especially of the man's muscles, but it does not appear to us to answer in the least to the poet's conception of "The passion that left the ground to lose

"itself in the sky."

Sir L. Alma-Tadema contributes this year a larger picture than has been his wont—a brilliant representation of "The Finding of Moses," with some exquisite blue flowers in the foreground, and the glamour of ancient Egypt upon the scene; but in the face of the princess we hardly see that "she had compassion on him."

Among the portrait groups we suggest the contrast between Sargent's "Marlborough Family" (256) and "On the Sands," by Hal Hurst (300), as a subject for useful reflection. "The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke," by W. Onslow Ford (502), does not strike us as a happy portrait. Among the landscapes MacWhirter has a refreshing variety of subject in "Loch Katrine" (89), "Lake of Como" (477), and "A Winter's Morning" (202), one of his exquisite silver birches in the snow. We note also "The Tithe-barns," by David Murray, R.A.-elect (255), "Now came still Evening on," by Joseph Farquharson, A.; "The Incoming Tide on the Cornish Coast," by B. W. Leader, R.A. (485), and "Autumn in the North Country," by E. Harrison Compton (511), with its striking effect of the evening shadow across the winter landscape.

Among the pictures by artists in whom many of our readers have a special interest, we could have wished for a better place for Miss Minna Tayler's "With Thought and Love, Companions of her way" (353), a girl among some tall white lilies. Mr. George Wetherbee has been more fortunate with his two pictures, "A Pensive Shepherd" (316) and "Hark! Hark! the Lark" (349). Mr. Savage Cooper has a picture of a Swiss churchyard among the mountains, "Hier ruht in Gott" (225), and Mr. Ernest E. Briggs, "Whitby: Evening" (914). In the Water-colour Room there is "Spring-time" (1,159), a lovely little child-face, by Miss Rosabella Drummond, among the miniatures; there also Miss Minna Bolinbroke has a little picture, "By the Roadside, Picardy" (1,072), and in the Black and White Room, "After Harvest" (1,322), a clever bit of wild life.

DR. MARTINEAU'S CENTENARY.

THE EMSLIE PORTRAIT.

SIR,—You are aware that a subscription is being raised to secure this portrait for Essex Hall. I should feel obliged if you will allow me to make known, through your columns, that the greater part of the amount necessary is in my hands. About £42 is still wanted, and forty subscribers of £1 1s. each would enable us to complete the purchase. I hope that among your readers I shall find those willing to help us, and that with their aid, before next week I shall be able to announce the acquisition of the portrait.

A relative of Dr. Martineau, and one who has already subscribed, writes: "It is an admirable likeness, and the purchase of it will be an appropriate memorial of the Centenary."

Subscriptions may be sent to me,

SIR,—Is not the present an opportune time for a popular edition of Dr. Martineau's "Endeavours after the Christian Life," and "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things," to be issued? It does seem a short-sighted policy on the part of those in authority that no effort or attempt has yet been made to send broadcast into the religious world the writings of the greatest of our Unitarian leaders. The two works above mentioned appeal to men of every creed and school of religious thought; yet at present they can only be purchased by the favoured few, or borrowed from some public library. There is not the slightest doubt but that a 1s. edition would find much favour, and reach thousands of homes to be read and treasured in hours of leisure. Popular editions are the order of the day. We can purchase for 6d., nicely printed, such well-known books as Seeley's "Ecce Homo," Dean Farrar's "Eternal Hope," Newman's "Apologia," &c.

Surely, then, there is more than something to be said for a cheap edition of the beautiful and uplifting writings of such a saint of theism as the late Dr. Martineau, whose centenary has been drawing attention once more to a noble personality, and the priceless heritage of spiritual thought he has left to the world in his books.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.—I.

MAY: "BE STRONG AND GENTLE!"

HAS it ever struck you, children, how flowers have their place in history, just in the same way that men and women have? Of course there can never be as many legends about them as there are about men, because flowers can never make their history as men can, but can only be our precious passive companions, to look beautiful and smell sweet. Yet some flowers have really had a place in history. Think how important the red and white roses were once in England, and how they gave their name to one of the longest and most terrible wars that has ever troubled our country. Do you not think, if flowers could feel, as some of the old legends about them would have us believe, the roses must have been sad that their name should be taken for anything so terrible as battles and fighting? Do you not think they would much rather name times of peace and happiness and plenty?

Fortunately, a great many of them do, and I want to tell you some of the legends which belong to special flowers, and are always associated with their names.

First of all, let us take a flower which, I am sure, is a favourite with us all. It is named after the month of May, when it flowers so beautifully, and tells us spring is come, and summer will soon be here. We like to think of it on May Day, the first of the month, which is still kept as a festival in some parts of England—the brightest and happiest in the whole year. There is hardly any part of the country where the may trees are not a beautiful sight when they first put on their red, and white, and pink flowers, covering themselves so thickly that sometimes you can scarcely see the leaves of the tree for the wealth of its blossom.

May is a favourite in many countries of Europe besides our own, and in them, as well as in England, May Day has always been considered a time of feasting, processions, and general rejoicing. There is a poem, which some of you know, by Tennyson, called "The Queen of the May." It tells how one little girl used to be chosen in a village to be crowned with May blossom and called the May Queen, and there are still many villages where a maypole is set up, on the first of the month, and children dance the maypole dance round it.

In some parts of France they have a pretty custom, and a pretty legend, about May. On the borders of fields the peasants will set up a little wooden cross, and surround it with wreaths and boughs of May, which they carefully change for new ones as the flowers fade. They think, if they do this, they are sure to get a good harvest. They have come to believe it from a legend which is said to date back to very early times indeed, when Christianity first spread over Europe.

A certain peasant was taken ill, and as he could do no work, his friends and neighbours agreed to dig and sow his fields for him, as it was just the time of the spring when, if nothing was done, he would get no harvest later in the summer. They worked hard and cheerfully, and in two days the sick man's fields were dug up and planted carefully with seed. Just as they were finishing their work, three little children, dressed in white, were seen in a field close by, busily planting some branches of May. The peasants were astonished to see them, for no one had ever seen these children before. They were astonished, too, to see how busily and carefully the little creatures were working. Suddenly, the legend says, the children opened beautiful white wings and flew away, singing hymns as they rose upwards to the clouds. From that day it was found that the field marked by these angels in memory of the peasants' kindness to the sick man yielded a double amount of corn and vegetables, and the custom has been passed on from year to year of putting boughs of May where a good harvest is hoped for.

Then there is one interesting part of English history where May gave its name to a well-known ship, the Mayflower, which carried the Pilgrim Fathers to North America. These men were Puritans, and because they were persecuted for what they believed, and for worshipping God in the way they considered right, they decided to leave their own country, and sail away to a new land where no one could interfere with them. In 1620 they set sail, and safely reached America, and here they settled down after a time to a new life and a new land, though they often must have thought lovingly of the land they had left behind them. There are people now in America claiming to be descended from the Pilgrim Fathers who sailed in the ship Mayflower.

It is said that May gave its name not only to the ship, but was chosen as the emblem of the Pilgrim Fathers too. Perhaps you have noticed how, though may is such a delicate and lovely flower in itself, a may tree has a very strong and sturdy trunk and branches. The name Mayflower was chosen for the ship because it would remind the people who sailed in it of an English spring. It was chosen as the emblem of the brave men because they prided themselves upon being what all Englishmen should try to be—strong as the boughs and trunk of the tree, and true and gentle—which will give them the beauty that the blossoms give to May.

MARTINEAU'S COLLEGE.

IT was fitting that the celebration of the centenary of the birth of JAMES MARTINEAU, held on the actual day, at Norwich, his native city, should be followed by a further commemoration at Manchester College, Oxford, the college with which the greater part of his long life was so intimately associated, which his genius adorned, and his spirit quickened, as its greatest teacher, for so many years. A student of Manchester College at York, professor at Manchester, and afterwards in London, and there also Principal, and finally President of the College, it is, especially to Dr. MARTINEAU'S old students, a very precious memory that the opening of the new buildings at Oxford was also consecrated by his presence, that it was he who pronounced the Benediction at the opening service, and gave that wonderful address at the first Communion service, which none who heard it can ever forget, in the autumn of 1893. "Brethren in the fellowship of CHRIST," he then said, "we have dedicated this building to the service of GOD in spirit and in truth. It remains that we dedicate ourselves, in all our use of it and life within it, to the highest claims of the Spirit and the surest leadings of the truth." His successor in the headship of the College, speaking memorial words both at Norwich and this week at Oxford, has borne worthy testimony to the manner in which his memory is cherished, and the spirit of his faithfulness to a great tradition still maintained by those who now carry on his work. In the College chapel on Monday evening it was inevitable that the memory of those opening services should be vividly recalled, and the noble and benignant presence should seem almost to be there, stretching out hands of benediction. "May this," said Dr. Drummond, "our memorial of the eager student, the faithful minister, the wise and gracious teacher, help to revive our fading impressions, and bring us through a holy imagination to hear his voice once more, and feel the spell of all that was highest in the thought and noblest in the character of JAMES MARTINEAU." And then in the library there was not only the WATTS portrait, but the statue which so wonderfully preserves for us the very presence of the revered and beloved Teacher.

It was a striking scene on Tuesday evening, during the last act of the commemoration in the College library. There was the throng of eager listeners, and among them MARTINEAU'S successor, and the present occupant of his chair in philosophy, while the brilliant Professor of another school paid indeed a noble tribute to the Teacher, but at the same time carried on his keen polemic in the conflict of thought, searching for the highest truth; and all the time, facing the lecturer and behind his living hearers, was the silent form enthroned, in the pure white marble, benignant always, with the deep lines of thought upon his face, and that profound look of one at peace and familiar with the deep things of the spirit.

In thanking Professor JONES for his address, Mr. WICKSTEED recalled memories of his own student days, of what MARTINEAU had taught, and how surely he had laid the foundations of a spiritual faith; and the present conflict between MARTINEAU'S philosophy and the Idealist's appeared to him (and Professor JONES seemed to admit it) to be simply a difference in the logic of interpretation, while in fundamental conception and their hold upon the profound realities of the spiritual life the two seemed to be at one. At any rate, Professor JONES earnestly declared that the battle which MARTINEAU had so splendidly fought against a materialist philosophy of life was practically won, and what had now to be achieved was a completer harmony in the interpretation of the things of the spirit. The issues of this most stimulating utterance we shall be able better to estimate when we have had the opportunity of careful study (as we hope soon to have) in its published form; but in any case we may rejoice in the thought that MARTINEAU himself would have enjoyed the debate, would have admired the brilliance and ardour of the lecturer, and would have honoured his eager enthusiasm as a single-minded servant of the Truth. Whether convinced or not of the cogency of the polemic, one may feel that the address was nobly dedicated to that high service to which MARTINEAU'S whole life was given, and that therefore it formed a worthy part of our commemoration.

This week is published Mr. CARPENTER'S book, "James Martineau, Theologian and Teacher: a Study of his Life and Thought." We accept it gratefully and with eager anticipation as another gift from his College and a most welcome addition to the Centenary memorials.

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

THE CELEBRATION AT MANCHESTER COLEGE, OXFORD.

THE centenary commemoration of Dr. Martineau at Manchester College was held on Monday and Tuesday, May 1 and 2. A religious service was held in the College Chapel on Monday evening, and on Tuesday there was a luncheon at the Randolph Hotel, at which a large number of the trustees and students of the College were present. That was, to some extent, a Manchester College home-party, but for the reception at the College in the evening invitations had been extended to a wider circle, and some distinguished members of the University were present. The Master of Balliol, who is one of the Visitors of Manchester College, was unfortunately away from Oxford, and was unable to take part in the commemoration. It will be remembered that when the statue of Dr. Martineau was unveiled in the library, he was one of the speakers.

Among those present, in addition to the Teaching Staff and officers of the College (the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers and Mr. Charles W. Jones, the treasurer, were abroad) were Miss Gertrude Martineau, Miss Edith Martineau, Mr. and Mrs. Basil Martineau, Mrs. Russell Martineau, Miss M. C. Martineau, the Rev. P. M. Higginson and Miss H. E. Higginson, Miss E. Higginson, Miss D. Higginson; Dr. Fairbairn, Principal of Mansfield College, and Mrs. Fairbairn, Mr. C. C. J. Webb (Senior Proctor), Rev. A. J. Carlyle and Mrs. Carlyle, Mr. F. C. S. Schiller, Dr. Vernon Bartlett, Dr. Buchanan Gray, Mr. Cook Wilson, Mr. G. E. Underhill, Mr. A. Souter, the Rev. R. D. Corbett, Lady Burden Saunderson, Lady Lockyer, Mrs. Sidgwick, the Misses Bonham-Carter, Miss Davenport Hill, Mrs. Beard, Mrs. W. B. Bowring, Mrs. J. F. Schwann, Mrs. Geldart, Mrs. Webb, Miss L. Jones, Miss H. M. Johnson, Mrs. Rutt, Miss Case, Miss Lister, Miss M. Pritchard, Miss M. S. Beard, Miss A. L. Browne, Miss Gittins, Miss H. Brooke Herford, Mrs. George Holt, Miss Holt, Mrs. John Dendy, Mrs. A. H. Worthington; the Revs. P. H. Wicksteed, C. T. Poynting, J. C. Odgers, J. Harwood, W. G. Tarrant, P. Prime, W. C. Bowie, J. Wood, T. Lloyd Jones, J. K. Smith, U. V. Herford, J. McDowell, H. D. Roberts, Alfred Hall, and V. D. Davis; Messrs. J. H. Brooks, S. B. Worthington, W. B. Bowring, Russell Scott, Richard Worsley, Philip J. Worsley, Rupert Potter, Ion Pritchard, G. H. Leigh, J. G. Pinnock, F. Pinnock, F. Nicholson, J. Dendy, J. Harrison, E. B. Squire, C. Sydney Jones, T. F. Ward, I. S. Lister, J. F. Schwann, H. R. Bramley, and W. C. Coupland.

Among those who sent letters of regret for absence were several heads of colleges and a number of old students of Manchester College, the Right Hon. J. Chamberlain, Mr. J. A. Kenrick, the Right Hon. W. Kenrick, Sir William Anson, the Rev. W. R. Inge, the Rev. S. A. Brooke, Mr. David Martineau, Mr. P. M. Martineau, Mr. C. G. Montefiore, Mr. R. D. Darbishire, Mr. Justice Wills, Sir W. H. Tate, Sir James Kitson, Sir R. K. Wilson, Sir Bernard Samuelson,

Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, Mr. Priestley Smith, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. W. Colfox, and many others who would gladly have been there had it been possible.

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

The College Chapel was well filled on Monday evening at the commemorative service, and it would be ungrateful not to record, with what true and beautiful feeling the organ prepared the way for the service of devotion. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter conducted the service, which opened with sentences as they are in Dr. Martineau's "Tenth Service" in the book of Common Prayer for Christian Worship, "Thoughts of peace, saith the Lord," and "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God," and the prayers (from the "Ninth Service"), "O God, who art, and wast, and art to come," and "O God, our everlasting hope," followed by the Lord's Prayer. The first hymn was Dr. Martineau's "Where is your God? they say." The first lesson, as at Norwich, was from Ecclesiasticus xliv., "Let us now praise famous men," followed by Dr. Martineau's wonderful canticle, the second in the Tenth service, "Blessed be the Lord God of ages." The second lesson was from Matt. v. and John iv., the Beatitudes, and the passage concluding "God is Spirit, and they that worship him, must worship in spirit and in truth." Mr. Carpenter's prayer of thanksgiving, commemoration and aspiration was followed by another of Dr. Martineau's hymns, "Thy way is in the deep, O Lord," and the sermon was then preached by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, on "Living Communion with God," from the text Ephes. iv. 6, "One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in all." It will be found printed in full in our present issue. The concluding hymn was Bishop Mant's,

> For all thy saints, O Lord,
> Who strove in Thee to live,
> Who followed Thee, obeyed, adored,
> Our grateful hymn receive.

It was a very beautiful and helpful service, and the words of the preacher will remain to keep fresh in our minds the central thought, which must ever be associated with the memory of Dr. Martineau.

THE LUNCHEON.

On Tuesday the President, Principal, and Committee of Manchester College gave a luncheon at the Randolph Hotel, of which over a hundred guests partook. This, as we have said, was of the nature of a home-party, to be followed by the more public reception at night. The President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, presided, and after the toast of the King had been duly honoured, he called upon the Rev. L. P. JACKS, who read some letters of regret for absence.

The first was from the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, chairman of the College Committee, who is still abroad on account of his health, and wrote from Switzerland. It was with profound disappointment, Mr. Dowson said, that he was compelled to be absent from the centenary celebration, in which it was most fitting that the college, of which Dr. Martineau was the illustrious head, should take a foremost place. Those of its alumni, who had the inestimable privilege of coming under his personal influence there, cherished the memory as that of one of the chief blessings of their lives. To have sat at the feet of such a man had been a source of inspiration enduring till the latest breath.

"For myself," he added "I can say with "humble thankfulness, that, amid the "crumbling away from beneath my feet "of the old basis of an external authority "for my religious faith, such as that on "which I had rested in my youth, it was "Dr. Martineau's teaching before all else "that replaced it for me by the surer "trust in the voice of the inner con-"science under the touch of the living "God. With others without number, "I have owed to Dr. Martineau, more "than to all besides, under God, the "sustenance of a faith in the all-righteous "Will of the Eternal Cause of all that is, "which has survived the severest shocks "of modern materialism. The debt of "the age to our greatest teacher's mental, "moral, and religious philosophy is "peculiarly felt by us whom, in personal "presence, and not alone by written word, "he inspired with a faith that cast out "fear, but to our personal relationship "with him we owe still more, in the "inspiration that fell upon us from his "supreme allegiance to duty, the voice of "conscience that spoke within his breast "commanding an obedience observed to "the uttermost, even in each lightest "word and smallest action. The standard "of life which he raised before our eyes "in his personal character was an even "greater thing that his inspiration of our "faith."

The next letter was dated from Kolozsvár, from some of Dr. Martineau's old Hungarian students, in the handwriting of Dr. George Boros, Dean of the Theological College, and signed also by Emeritus Professor Gregory Benczédi, Professor Charles Derzsy, Professor Denis Varga, and the Rev. Nicholas Gál.

"If you are grateful," they said, "to "Divine Providence for the blessings "conferred upon you through this great "master of the soul, we are still more so, "since we found in him not only a "teacher, but a father also.

"No words of ours are befitting to "express his merits. No single occasion "enough to give utterance to our "gratitude.

"We bring our deep homage to his immor-"tal memory. To all those who are heirs of "his unparalleled poetical language, to "those who tread in his footsteps in the "pulpit and lecture-room; to those who "felt induced to seize the occasion of his "one hundredth birthday in order to "explain to the world what they owe to "him who has left us but a few years "ago—to all of you we send our assur-"ance that we, his disciples, sent out to "this far Eastern corner of Europe, do "our best to make the spirit of the great "master live and bear fruits for the "benefit of mankind.

"We endeavour to make life more "Christian by preaching and teaching the "grounds and truths of religion in accord-"ance with his high conceptions. We sing "his hymns together with those left to us "by the great apostle of Unitarianism, "Francis Dávid, and we nourish the "devotion of our people by his saintly "prayers and meditations.

"In the antithetical turmoil of un-"reasonable belief and sceptical unbelief "of the day, we go to the only seat of "authority in religion, he so marvellously "pointed out in his last master-piece of "work.

"We cannot silence even our patriotic "feeling, for he was one of the few whose "great soul penetrated even that thick "veil, which kept hidden our long-suffer-"ing nation from the clear sight of "Western Europe. He appreciated Hun-"gary's mission, and took always the "defensive part in our favour.

"Be assured, then, that though far "away in space, we shall be with you in "spirit at this grand memorial season. "May his masterly spirit kindle in us the "spirit of true religion as he taught it, "the power of saving morality as he lived "it in his long saintly life."

Mr. Jacks also read a cordial letter from the Rev. Denis Peterfi, another of Dr. Martineau's old Hungarian students, and announced a large number of letters of regret for absence, to which reference is made at the beginning of this report.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER gave an address in memory of Dr. Martineau. No old student of Dr. Martineau, he said, could rise on such an occasion as that to present to them his sacred memory without feeling so great a throng of recollections fill his mind that it was impossible in a few minutes to gather together a sufficiently collected picture of his great personality. They knew for how many years he was connected with that college, in what various capacities he was related to it—five years as student, two years as one of the secretaries, forty-five years as a lecturer on philosophy, and for sixteen of those forty-five as principal of the college. And when he laid down that function he was still to serve it for two years longer as its president. Well might he, therefore, say on his retirement from a formal connection which had continued for more than half a century: "I was myself its creation, moulded by it to the very marrow of me, formed by its clay, and shaped by its wheel." Often in later life Dr. Martineau expressed his sense of the loss he had endured from his inability to prepare himself for the work of his life at one of the ancient universities. But, deeply as he regretted that the venerable seats of learning closed themselves in his day by bonds of subscription which he would not take upon himself, he never faltered in his allegiance to the principles which he had learnt at Manchester College at York. There he came under the influence of tutors to whom in later days he paid noble tribute—Charles Wellbeloved and John Kenrick. From them he imbibed that love of accurate and exact learning, that strenuous prosecution of plain living and high thinking, that love of the Bible and its studies which he cherished to the last days of his career. Mr. Carpenter then spoke of the strenuous Unitarian zeal by which he was fired while studying at York, which led him to engage in Sunday-school work, and take an eager share in the activity of the college missionary society in the villages round about, so that on one occasion he walked thirty miles from York to Thorn, and there preached three times on the Sunday, walking back the thirty miles at night to be in his place at college on the Monday morning. He also told of the student's thoroughness and of the volumes of college notebooks which Dr. Martineau preserved to the last as a memorial of his York days; and then of the friendships formed in later life at the college, some of the dearest of his life, with John James Tayler, to whom he was bound in ties of such tender sympathy, and with that prophet of God, Francis William Newman, in whose teaching he found so much support. It was in the college, from 1840 onward, that he first wrought out the great change in his theological and philosophical conceptions, already publicly indicated in the "Rationale of Religious Enquiry," in 1836, and his great contribution to the Unitarian controversy of 1839, the change by which the basis of religious belief was shifted from the Bible to the conscience and affections in the soul of man. It was to give a philosophical justification to the primary trusts and sentiments of the human soul that he devoted those laborious years in the service of the college. Elsewhere he engaged in historical and critical researches. In college his work was so to reconstruct the philosophy in which he had been brought up as to find a sure basis for the great truths of religion, the very centre of his being.

Speaking further of the leading principles and dominant aspects of Dr. Martineau's personality, Mr. Carpenter dwelt first on his great intellectual genius. He was marked by the vast sweep of his thought. He took rank among the greatest thinkers of his time, as Gladstone bore testimony. He impressed his students with his magnificent confidence that truth was within their reach. He never shrank from the most difficult problems. His work, confronting the great questions of man and nature and God, was marked by an heroic fearlessness which brought him to ever wider views. So he was brought on one side into sympathy with the Transcendental movement of New England; and, though he found its leaders deficient in constructive power, yet he had most sympathetic relations with Emerson and others, whose work he followed with admiration. As to his own love of construction, every student remembered what exquisite precision marked all his utterance; and his justice and insight were so great that none of those from whom he differed suffered by his exposition—indeed, sometimes he expressed their views with greater clearness and force than they did themselves. He was great as an exponent, greater as a critic, but greatest of all in those profound lectures on ethics and religion, in which they felt him to be a vehicle of the spirit of prophecy greater than himself; and through his words came the sublime utterance, "Thus saith the Lord."

His great intellectual qualities were dominated by a moral energy the perpetual wonder of students less strenuous than he. They wondered at the range of his knowledge, his mastery of detail, the way in which all was marshalled in complete order. That was possible only to one who had the most resolute control of his time and strength.

Mr. Carpenter then told how, more than thirty years ago, he was Dr. Martineau's guest in a delightful summer home in the Tay valley. There was no study in the house, and Dr. Martineau invited him to share the table in the dining-room, where he himself worked. He was engaged in a renewed study of Kant, in preparation for his final course on the Grounds and Truths of Religion. "Never shall I forget," said Mr. Carpenter, "the look of concentration as he braced himself up with a volume before him, the whole frame erect in his chair, the face tense, the head perfectly poised on the shoulders, the arms drawn in as with the utmost self-concentration. So, hour by hour, he sat—a living impersonation of energy, of resolve, and intellectual grip." It was by such labours continued for so many years that he was able at last to work out in all their ripeness his great treatises on ethics and religion.

Mr. Carpenter spoke next of Dr. Martineau's extraordinary power of sympathetic comprehension of the inner lives of his students, gained through his habitual contact as a teacher with children and young people, his constant vivid interest in every aspect of life, and his conviction that philosophy was not a thing detached from life, but the interpretation of life. So he knew their secrets, understood their perplexities, and could help them in every kind of difficulty; and they looked to him with a reverence and admiration given to no other man. And it was not only the young men who gathered round him in College, but latterly there was a band of distinguished women, among whom were Anna Swanwick and Frances Power Cobbe, who for two or three years followed his lectures. That was the beginning of a new work for the College, which deserved to be signalised, for Dr. Martineau was from the first favourable to the opening of the College and its classes to women.

So he had left them an impression of greatness to be cherished as a possession for ever. Two other great theologians of the last century could be named beside him in this country, John Henry Newman, four years his senior, and Frederick Denison Maurice, his contemporary. For both he had the deepest admiration. To Newman they owed the great Catholic revival and the restoration of the doctrine of the authority of the Church, to Maurice the transference of the centre of theology from the old Calvinistic doctrines to the far profounder conception of the Incarnation. It had been said that Martineau, unlike those two, had contributed no special doctrine to modern theology; but that was because he was concerned with the foundations of all, on which all interpretations of the world, and man, and God must be based. In the "Seat of Authority," which showed how the foundations of religion are to be found in the reason, the conscience, and the heart of man, they had the charter of their freedom. That was the true interpretation of Martineau's life-long work, to establish the grounds of religion where alone they are universal, in human experience, the structure of human thought, the life of the human conscience, the aspirations of the human soul. When that is once realised, no matter what our historical interpretations of religion, the Catholic communion for which he never ceased to pray will be achieved, and the work of which he was the great leader in the last century will be fulfilled.

At the conclusion of Mr. Carpenter's address, the company rose and stood in silence, in reverent remembrance of Dr. Martineau.

The President then proposed "Prosperity to Manchester College." He recalled the fact that in that very room nearly twelve years ago, at the time of the opening of the new College buildings, Dr. Martineau had responded to that toast, and then referred to the long line of descent of the College, from the days of Richard Frankland and his academy at Rathmell, and the high tradition of scholarship and freedom which had been maintained. Of their teachers, he would not dwell on those of earlier days, nor need he speak further of Wellbeloved and Kenrick, but he rejoiced at the way in which John James Tayler's name had been linked with Martineau's in that commemoration (especially in Mr. Wicksteed's article in The Inquirer), and that the religious power of Francis Newman had been so vividly brought before them in Mr. Upton's delightful edition of his book on "The Soul." He referred also to the high scholarship of Dr. Vance Smith, and his work as one of the N.T. Revisers. Having spoken of the present admirable equipment of the College in its teaching staff, he said in conclusion: "We have the material here to furnish those who come to study with the best weapons that they need to fight against the ignorance, the unbelief, the sin, and the sorrow of the world. What we do need is the fitting body of students to receive the lessons which our teachers are so ready and willing to impart. There is a responsibility resting on us all, to try and bring under the good influences we have gathered here the right material to receive the lessons we can give, and to send forth, as our last report desired, "'men who have been trained in love of truth, simplicity, and goodness; men strong in character and intellect and faith,' with earnest desire to grow in the knowledge of things divine, to send them forth into the world armed with the weapons that they need, the whole armour of God, to show forth His glory, and to win mankind to righteousness and truth."

The Rev. Dr. Drummond responded, and said it was always a great honour to do so, not only because it was an honour to be in any way connected with the College which had been adorned by the man in whose memory they were assembled, but also because of the great principles it had always maintained. Without going back into the remote history of the Academies, it was difficult to believe that after their College was founded, for more than a quarter of a century, it was penal (though the law was not enforced) to profess or teach Unitarianism, and for more than three-quarters of a century the national universities were closed against such a man as Martineau. Those were days of intolerance and exclusion, and their fathers were determined, in spite of that, to have the advantages of real university education: They had profited by the lessons of intolerance, and founded their academy on very different principles. They would not suffer truth to be in any way bound, but left it to rest on the free providence of God and the conscience of each man who sought it; and the result was that in the history of that College, theology had undergone a most profound change, which was now beginning to permeate nearly all the churches. The old assumption of the infallible authority of the Bible was gone, it was no longer a purely miraculous book, but it was seen to be written by men inspired by the Spirit of God, yet not exempt from intellectual errors, men lifted up into higher regions of feeling and experience, even as men might be now by the good Spirit of God; and so, instead of being less interesting or authoritative, the Bible made a far deeper and finer appeal. They endeavoured to penetrate into the heart and spirit of the men who wrote the books and to be filled with their spirit. It was not an outward authority, but an inward inspiration which fed the deepest fountains of their religious life. And that change could only have come about as it had done in their College, in its calm course, because their fathers trusted the truth. And now they found the principle of the College beginning to prevail more widely. The modern universities were establishing open faculties of theology, in which men were appointed not on account of ecclesiastical connection or creed, but for their tried capacity. And in the Established Church an interesting manifesto had been issued by a number of clergymen anxious for the privileges they had so long enjoyed. Their manifesto was founded on the known fact that there was great unsettlement in religious opinions, and they were anxious to meet it in the fullest, frankest, and most fearless way, so that all the resources of thought and learning and religious feeling might be brought to bear on the problems, and a true and satisfying solution be reached. The memorialists asked for authoritative encouragement to face the critical problems of the New Testament with entire candour and reverence for God and His truth, and loyalty to the Church of Christ. One would suppose that was a petition with which all earnest men must agree; but it had been met by a counter manifesto from the Bible Students' Union, which endeavoured to pour contempt on the Higher Criticism, and treated those men as utterly beneath notice. They could only conclude that the members of that Union desired that the New Testament should be studied with an entire want of candour; and, if he might judge from the correspondence which had been appearing in the newspapers, the original manifesto had been met by what he could only call a yell of vulgar insolence. And the misery of the thing was that those men assumed that they themselves were the only real Christians, and that those whom they could not understand were beneath the notice of such religious and highly consecrated men. He hoped for the sake of religion and the Church of England that was not the spirit which would prevail. But if so, then, alas for the Church of England! It would be cut off from the reverence and the culture of the country, and would sink into impotence and contempt. None of them, whatever they had suffered in the past, could wish for such a result. They had no wish but that the Church should cultivate the highest and truest religion, full of the spirit of Christ, to inspire and teach their fellow-countrymen. And they of Manchester College might well rejoice that in however limited a way the principles which to them had been as bread of life were spreading through the community. They could not but feel it a great and honourable responsibility to stand in the line of the great and strong men whom they delighted to remember. They could not have their powers, but might cherish their spirit. And he would say for his colleagues and himself that they were aware of their responsibility, and deeply devoted to the best traditions of the College. They would spend whatever powers were granted to them in encouraging the study of theology as a true, deep, intimate personal knowledge of God for the conscience and the soul, and in asking their students to devote their lives to spreading abroad among their fellow-countrymen whatever they might learn from them or from others, and, above all, from their own communion with God. So they might hope that, if ever they met on such an occasion again, the spirit they valued would have spread yet more widely and have come to be recognised by all the leading minds of their country as alone worthy of the followers and disciples of Christ.

The concluding toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty" was proposed by the Rev. Joseph Wood, and responded to by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, and a vote of thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. L. P. Jacks and very cordially passed, brought the proceedings to a close.

The Reception.

On Tuesday evening a reception was held at the College, attended by over 200 guests, who were received by the President and Principal in the large lecture-room. In the earlier part of the evening there was an organ recital in the chapel, and at nine o'clock the President took the chair in the library, when an address was given by Professor Henry Jones, LL.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University or Glasgow, on "The Philosophy of Martineau in Relation to the Idealism of the Present Day."

In introducing Professor Jones the President said that they welcomed him with peculiar gratitude. He was no stranger to that College, but as Dunkin lecturer had rendered them great service by his course on "The Working Hypothesis of the Science of Social Life."

Professor Henry Jones's Address.

Professor Jones's address, which lasted an hour and a quarter, was compact of strenuous thought and brilliant in its exposition of that form of philosophy known as Absolute Idealism. It was delightful to listen to from the vivid personality of the speaker, the noble enthusiasm by which he was evidently fired. No attempt even of the briefest summary is possible here, but we have little doubt that the lecture will be published by the College authorities, when it will demand the closest attention and be found a potent stimulus to earnest thought.

The following are the opening passages of the address:—

I consider it a great privilege to come amongst you on this occasion, when you are commemorating the noble service performed by a great and good man for his age and people. Many of you are bound to him not only by your recognition of the value of his elevated character and wise thoughts expressed in his written works, but by the still closer ties of personal affection and spiritual discipleship. To these closer ties I cannot justly lay any claim. I come here known, in so far as I am known at all, to be the adherent of a school of thought which is in many respects different, and in some respects antagonistic, to that of Dr. Martineau. And, still more, my specific task to-night is to place the two bodies of doctrine in contrast; for I have to speak of Dr. Martineau's philosophy in relation to the Idealism of the Present Day.

But this, in some ways, makes me value my privilege still higher. The task you have placed in my hands implies a trust for which any man may well feel grateful: it implies your belief that criticism, if it is faithful to its end, cannot touch affectionate hearts with a cold hand, nor lessen the reverence of disciples for a lost Master. And this belief I share. True criticism springs from reverence, and is, indeed, the expression of it. A great man, through his works, imposes the duty of criticism upon his people. His thoughts challenge the world in proportion to their originality and their worth; and the world recognises their worth in accepting the challenge. Nor can it show to them any deeper reverence. For it is by criticism, by placing his thoughts in the context of its experience, that it can possess them and transmute the truth that is theirs into vital elements of its own growing life.

I take up my task in the spirit of generous freedom in which it was placed in my hands; and I know well that the great man whom we have met to commemorate to-night could have wished nothing different, except that the hands into which it has fallen were stronger. For he was one of the noble knights of the Spirit of Holiness, which is called in the sacred book the "Spirit of Truth."

For the unfolding of Professor Jones's theme, his exposition of the affinity between Dr. Martineau's philosophy and Absolute Idealism, and where that affinity turns into sharpest contrast, our readers must look to the publication of the address in its complete form. There also they will see what a living thing Absolute Idealism is to Professor Jones, and how he vindicates the place of a true spiritual freedom in his scheme of thought. Here we claim the privilege only of reproducing the concluding passages of the address.

Professor Jones had been speaking of how man finds his true freedom in surrender to the will of God, and so receives back his will, his life, his soul; and receives it back "transfigured by its identity with the life of God." And so he concluded :—

"But we are being carried by our argument into that region where morality and religion merge in one another; and man finds himself in God. And who realised this truth, of all the men you knew, more fully than Dr. Martineau?

"Would I be wrong, think you, in saying that even if his philosophical method broke in his hand like a weapon not well tempered for such a war, he still fought his way onward with the brand Excalibur, and reached the peaceful heights from which God is seen to be very near to man? And this, indeed, was the conception that crowned his achievement, the truth that was newest in his hands, the contribution to religious thought which those who knew him best could prize most highly. It was the correction of the hard and exclusive deism of his early environment, the discovery that God was immanent in the world and in man, even the soul of his soul. To few men has it been given to declare with such a clarion voice the sovereignty of the moral law. None knew more fully that man must work out his moral problem alone, and holds in the hollow of his own weak hands his deepest weal or woe. But still he left not 'each soul a spiritual island planted out in the natural deep of things, beaten by the tides of Law that sweep around.' Our spiritual nature is not thus 'rounded off into self-sufficient isolation.' 'In the field of spiritual affection that lies around our will, the common essence of man and God, the divine element that spreads its margin into us, has its home, its life, its reciprocal recognition; its bursts of human prayer, its answer of Divine compassion, its deep shadows of contrition, and returning gleams of restoration.' [Martineau's Essays, vol. iv. pp. 578-80.]

"We have been contrasting the methods of two philosophies, for that was our task, and in its own place none can deny its significance. But let us not entirely forget that beneath and above and around its methods there often lie for philosophy meanings it can ill express. There are truths which 'we in our poverty of thought have to take up successively,' and which we often seek in vain to hold together. Burdened with our doubts, baffled by our own reasonings, stumbling all too frequently over our own simplest thoughts, climbing the Hill Difficulty as on our hands and knees, creeping from fact to fact, those who have embraced divine philosophy will prize most highly of all those moments when religion takes them by the hand and plants them in a purer air where they can see, though from afar, the golden gates of the city of God. And in this respect at least, the contrast of the two philosophies, nay, of all the errant searchings of man after truth, melts into a greater harmony."

At the conclusion of the address a vote of the warmest thanks to Professor Jones was proposed by the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed and seconded by the Rev. L. P. Jacks. We shall not attempt here any report of Mr. Wicksteed's illuminating comment on the address, the substance of which we have not reported, but when it is published we shall ask him to be good enough to write more fully in these columns the thoughts which it suggested to him. Mr. Wicksteed paid a warm tribute to the splendid courage and conviction of the lecturer, and to the spirit in which he had accomplished his task; and in the same sense Mr. Jacks spoke, saying how they had felt in the address the fires of moral and intellectual enthusiasm, and the power of the speaker. Speaking of Martineau, Mr. Jacks said that his name stood to them for something more than a system of philosophy, for a great soul, one whom their hearts held in no common reverence and love, by whom their lives had been deeply influenced. No divergence of their thought could separate them from him; they never could believe that ultimately he was wrong; ultimately, in his deepest meaning, they were sure he was right. But he doubted whether Martineau as a philosopher ever succeeded in unfolding to the world the fullest implications of his religious insight. In his devotional utterances there were facts of the spiritual life implied which had yet to be reconciled in philosophic thought. It was the finest task awaiting religious philosophy to find that deeper harmony.

Professor Jones having cordially responded to the vote of thanks, the President expressed their great indebtedness, especially to Mr. Jacks, for all the arrangements which had been so admirably made to secure the success of those gatherings, and the meeting was brought to a close.

RELIGIOUS FORCES OF THE METROPOLIS.

IV.—Dr. Clifford at Westbourne Park.

No reckoning of the religious forces of the Metropolis would be complete which did not include the strenuous figure of Dr. John Clifford, Baptist minister, university graduate in three faculties, Free Churchman, democrat, "passive resister," agitator, watchdog of political and religious liberty, the Nonconformist conscience incarnate, not in word only, but in power. It is a testimony to Dr. Clifford's work and character that he has become a man to be reckoned with, alike by clergy, politicians, and journalists; honoured by the hatred and scoffing of certain opponents of the baser sort, and by the unfaltering devotion of thousands of plain people up and down the land who know his works and are proud to range themselves by his side.

If he can help it—and he will not, perhaps, be without a say in the matter—the coming Liberal Government will not be a government of snobs, trimmers, and plutocrats. Toryism, Imperialism, Clericalism, Militarism, jobbery, nepotism, and class-selfishness—the whole system of incompetence and reaction under which the country has been suffering for the last twenty years—found in him, throughout, a most powerful and consistent foe, and will own him soon as one of the avengers. I envy the religious community which numbers Dr. Clifford among its members: there is no likelihood of the stagnation of "respectability" and the inaction of fear in the regions where his influence is felt. He is not much of a sectary, but is none the worse for that. His bias is towards social, intellectual, and moral reform. He loves to link himself with the Puritans, but in his case it is Puritanism with a difference. His doctrine is progressive, rational, and humane. We may be thankful that he has none of Spurgeon's theological limitation, or Price Hughes's hot sectarian zeal, or any taint of that narrow Scriptural pietism, allied to a conservative habit in public affairs, which has so often made Evangelicalism a grave obstacle in the path of progress. He is, in fine, a thoroughly live progressive thinker and worker; a friend of peace, a hater of all tyranny, social injustice, and sham religionism; a lover of the poor, a strenuous worker for the redemption of society and the elevation of human life. A lady of my acquaintance, who has devoted a long life to good works, is fond of speaking of him as "one of the few real Christians in the ranks of the clerical profession."

At a service at Westbourne Park Chapel which I attended recently a phrase fell from Dr. Clifford's lips, in prayer, which reveals the fibre of the man, and the kinship of the prophets to which he belongs: "Help us, O God, that our faith may be heroic." The charm and attraction of his ministry is that he preaches applied Christianity. Others appeal specially to the æsthetic, the ratiocinative, or the emotional faculties; but he, supremely to the ethical. He deals habitually with questions of social and national morals. Many ministers find it either natural or convenient to give the go-by to all burning questions, preaching the generalities rather than the particularities of ethics, and thus wasting a good deal of powder without making their shots go home effectively. That this has not been the method of the Happy Warrior of Westbourne Park we may feel assured. He is a man of mettle, and chooses the battle against entrenched injustice and evil, in preference to the easier tasks in which the priestly type of cleric shines. Those sunk, inward-looking eyes under the domed brow; those nervous hands, now clasped, now flung wide in protest, or outstretched in rebuke; that intensity of look, manner, and voice—suggest the man of faith who is also the enthusiast and crusader. His tone in preaching is, for the most part, one of sweet reasonableness and quiet appeal; and there is a certain childlike purity of glance and phrase which is winning and persuasive. But the old lion can roar. The frequent volcanic outbursts remind us of the hidden fires, and the general impression is one of great strength, persistence, and indomitable courage.

I have met with people whose sole idea of Dr. Clifford is that he spends most of his time in scouring the country, appearing in police-courts in connection with the administration of the Education Acts, and speaking on political platforms; and dark allusions are made, every now and then, to the "priest in politics"—a phrase which, if applied to the minister of Westbourne Park, shows a curious ignorance of his principles and genius. He is not the priest in politics, ever working for his cloth, his sect; but the prophet in action, claiming the rights and fulfilling the obligations of his citizenship. I imagine that most of his critics would be put to shame if they would take a glance at the "Year Book for 1904, of Westbourne Park, Praed Street, and Bosworth Road Church," or the "Monthly Record of Westbourne Park Chapel," which lie before me—the former a substantial pamphlet of seventy pages, the latter a quarto magazine of ten pages with cover.

The ministry of Dr. Clifford commenced as long ago as October 17, 1858, in the then little Tabernacle in Praed-street, Paddington, with a church membership of about sixty. We are told that "the average additions per annum from that date to 1876 were sixty-seven, and the number of membership in 1876 was 574." The present building in Westbourne Park (in an unattractive and rather dreary neighbourhood) was erected in 1876 at a cost, inclusive of land, of £15,000. Since then, a number of adjacent houses have been successively acquired, for the purposes of a church parlour, library, reading-room, gymnasium, and a home for young women, containing sixteen beds, which is used also as a registry office and for the Y.W.C.A. Praed-street Chapel still continues its work, under a separate ministry. Bosworth-road Chapel, in the neighbourhood of Kensal Town, is used as a branch mission centre. There is also an evangelistic mission at Norman Hall, in the Harrow-road; and there are two Sunday-schools, held upon Board-school premises. Three suburban chapels, in the districts of Ealing, Hornsey, and East Finchley, are named as having sprung from Westbourne Park. To read the annual reports of the Bible Circle Society, the Sunday Afternoon Conference (at which a member of Little Portland-street Chapel read a paper a month ago), the Sunday-schools, the Home for Young Women, the Y.W.C.A., the Institute (with its splendid series of lectures), the Dorcas Society, the Ladies' Missionary Working Party, the Country Ministers' Aid Society, the Domestic Mission, the Choir, the Mothers' Meeting, the Band of Hope, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour, the P.S.A. Brotherhood, the Temperance and Social Crusade, the Prayer Circle, and the rest, is to get a striking impression of a working Christian Church which at once commands our admiration and challenges our own inadequate effort.

On a recent Sunday evening, I found Westbourne Park Chapel comfortably filled with a congregation of nearly 1,000 persons. It is a middle-class congregation, containing few people of wealth, and many, I should judge, of small means. I saw no carriages at the door (that trade-mark of ecclesiastical respectability!). The building does not attract me, though it has some good points with regard to internal arrangement. The service is simple, with one Lesson (read from "The Bible in Modern English") and one prayer—a touching and helpful communion and intercession. After a long list of announcements came the sermon, founded on the teaching of Jesus about prayer, recorded in Luke xi.—a sermon full of practical religion and spiritual insight, with no word of controversial theology. Beginning with a brief survey of some great prayer-moments of history, the Scriptural portraits of Abraham, Jacob, and Daniel, and the modern types of prayerful men—Oliver Cromwell, the Covenanters, and the Hollanders who confronted Alva, were rapidly sketched. "When great men and great times are born, they come, as it were, saturated with prayer. No man started a new epoch without begetting prayer. It is said we live in a hard time. All new times are hard" (this with a ringing challenge in the voice); "they mean fighting, contention, battle. Was that not so with Christ's own time? and did He not know it? The disciples must have heard notes of agony in the prayers of Jesus.—'Lord, teach us to pray,' that would be our appeal, if we knew what our times were, if we saw the misery and wretchedness of our fellows. Prayer is not to be measured by its length, its form, its elaboration, but by the ideas it contains and the trust it expresses. Christ's own prayer was simple. Simplicity is not the first achievement of genius, but the last. We must not misunderstand the Gospel parable of importunity. Persistence in prayer is needed, not to touch the heart of God, but for the education of man, and as an earnest of his sincerity. Finally, let your prayers be intercessions for others' needs as well as your own. Have you no one that you love well enough to pray for? no young lives? none in your homes? no friend? no wandering son?" So, on this appealing note, the sermon ended; and I fancy that few could have left the church without feeling awakened, strengthened, and uplifted. I can feel no doubt that Dr. Clifford's ministry of nearly 50 years in Westbourne Park has been one of the most valuable religious forces in the life of the Metropolis.

H. S. PERRIS.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

THE fourth annual meeting of the Guilds' Union was held at the Great Meeting, Leicester, on Easter Tuesday, April 25. There was a good gathering of Guild members and friends, though several guilds again found it impossible to send representatives, owing to the distance. The business meeting was held in the school-room, in the afternoon, the president of the Union, Rev. Joseph Wood, being in the chair. General regret was expressed at the absence of Rev. E. W. Lummis, and an affectionate message of sympathy and good wishes was sent to him.

The Rev. Gordon Cooper read the council's report, which referred to the resignation, at the last annual meeting held at Kidderminster, of the secretaryship by the Rev. John Ellis, and expressed warm appreciation of his services, not only in inaugurating the Union, but in acting as its secretary for the first three years. The council had decided to continue the Prize Essay scheme for another year, but only twelve essays were sent in from four guilds. The examiners' awards were given. In further endeavour to promote religious reading and serious study among Guild members, the council decided to recommend the formation of reading circles, and the idea had been acted upon in some Guilds, and the meetings had proved interesting and helpful.

The number of Guilds affiliated to the Union was 29. New Guilds had been formed at Nottingham, Dewsbury, Walthamstow and Bermondsey, and it was hoped they would shortly join the Union. Following the example of the London Guilds, a union of local Guilds had been formed in the Atherton district, comprising the Guilds of Atherton, Leigh, Astley and Swinton. The council had pleasure in announcing that the Rev. F. K. FREESTON and the secretary had undertaken the preparation of a new Guilds' Year Book for 1906, to be published in the Autumn of the present year. The retiring president, the Rev. Joseph Wood, was warmly thanked for all he had done for the Guild movement.

The treasurer, Mr. H. P. GREG, presented his accounts, which showed a small balance in hand.

In moving the adoption of the reports, the CHAIRMAN confessed to a certain feeling of disappointment at the slow growth of the Guild movement in this country, when compared with the corresponding institutions in America; but there was much to encourage those who were interested in the work of the Guilds, and he was particularly pleased with the results of the essay competition. Mr. Wood went on to speak of the charm of young life—of its unknown possibilities, and its dangers. It was not given to everyone to be a Beethoven or a Watts, but greatness of character was possible for all, and they had to remind young people that there was such a thing as heroic will; that they were their own keepers, and must work out their own destiny.

The adoption of the reports was seconded by Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, who said that success must not be judged by members only. The question we must ask ourselves was, not, have we succeeded? but have we done our best? If we put our best efforts into our work, then all would be well. The Rev. F. K. FREESTON was elected president in succession to Rev. Joseph Wood, who has held the office since the formation of the Union, four years ago. On the proposition of Rev. H. GOW, seconded by Mr. A. H. PAGET, the heartiest thanks of the meeting were given to the outgoing president for his past services. It would be impossible to exaggerate the services he had rendered: for his sake the movement ought to succeed.

The business meeting was followed by a conference, at which Rev. ALFRED HALL spoke on "The Relation of the Guild to the Church and the Sunday School." Mr. Hall is warden of a large and successful Guild at Norwich, and his address, which was based upon his own experience, was full of valuable hints and helpful suggestions. In dealing with the question, How to stop the leakage of young people from our churches and schools, Mr. Hall advocated the establishment of a Roll Book, in which the names of all the young people—the names, i.e., of all children of members of the church—and of all Sunday school scholars over sixteen years of age—should be registered. Personality, however, was better than all organisation, and what our churches wanted was laymen who would interest themselves in the young people of the church and school. And he gave as an instance the work of John Withers Dowson at Norwich. Mr. Hall recommended the institution of Junior Guilds, for the management of which the members of the Senior Guild should be held responsible; and he strongly urged that the Guild should undertake some definite work on behalf of the church. It was good to give them responsibility and to get them to make some special effort. The members of the Guild at Norwich had made themselves responsible for one penny a week, and this, in two years, had resulted in nearly £50 being added to the Building Fund Mr. Hall was quite prepared to make concessions to the young people; in addition to meetings for serious study and religious culture it was well, he said, to arrange others of a lighter character, for we have to teach young people what things to enjoy and how to enjoy them. At Norwich they had evenings devoted to "Hobbies," "Curiosities," "Competitions," "Nature and the Camera," &c. Two things, he concluded, were essential if we would retain our hold over our young people. We must have sympathy with them in their religious struggles and in their daily work; in return for this sympathy they would work for the church. And we must have faith in them and try to inspire them with confidence in themselves.

The Chairman, Rev. A. H. Dolphin, Mr. Richard Robinson, and Mrs. Wallace Bruce all bore testimony to the value and helpfulness of Mr. Hall's paper, and heartily thanked him for his address.

In the evening the annual service was held in the Great Meeting, when a large congregation assembled. The service was conducted by the Rev. GERTRUD VON PETZOLD, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, who took for his text Paul's answer to the jailor's question "What must I do to be saved?"—"Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved." Mr. Hargrove drew a vivid picture of the scene in the jail, and then went on to say they might be sure that Paul taught the jailor no doctrine of a Trinity, and expounded no scheme of salvation. If a man to-day, troubled with religious difficulties and theological doubts, was advised to "Believe on Dr. Martineau," or if another man, uncertain how to cast his vote, was told to "Believe in Mr. Chamberlain," we should be in no danger of misunderstanding the advice. Accept Dr. Martineau as your guide and teacher and your theological difficulties will disappear. So believe in Christ—not in any doctrine as to the character of Christ, nor in any stories which have grown up round his name, but believe in Christ, and accept him as your teacher, and you'll be saved. And this was the message Mr. Hargrove gave to his fellow Guild members. Believe in Christ; believe what Jesus taught about love to God, and love to man. Let them love God; such love would save them, would reconcile them to their environment, and bring peace to their souls. Let them love man; such love would save them from envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness. But there was a danger to guard against—our religion must not develop into mere sentiment. Christ severely condemned the substitution of sentiment for true religion. "He that doeth the will of my Father shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven." In the parable of the sheep and the goats there is no judgment of belief; the test is have they, or have they not, been of service to others? This law of service is the law of life. It was no creed, no subscription, no common name, that bound them together as Guild members. The bond that united them was the declaration of their belief in the Lord Jesus, their acceptance of Jesus as their teacher, as the teacher of love to God, and love to man, proved by the service of man, which is the only service which God requires.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, April 30, to large congregations by the Rev. H. J. Rossington, of Longsight. Special hymns were sung by an augmented choir, and also by the children, the singing being accompanied by a string band. The collections amounted to £19 10s.

Bolton: Halliwell-road (Presentation).—The chapel was crowded on Wednesday, April 26, on the occasion of a conversazione held as a farewell to Rev. John Evans on his removal to Colne. During the evening the Rev. J. H. Weatherall took the chair, and expressed the general regret at Mr. Evans' removal, and the affection with which he was regarded by all his co-workers. This was supported by Mr. S. Halliwell, speaking for the congregation; Mr. F. W. Battersby for the school; Mr. S. France for the Social Guild; and Revs. R. C. Moore, Wilfred Harris, and E. E. Jenkins for the ministers of the district. A presentation was then made by Mr. Joseph Bullough to Mr. Evans, consisting of a roll-top desk, a study chair, and a clock, the cost of which had been met by the spontaneous offerings of Mr. Evans' friends at Halliwell-road. Mr. Evans suitably acknowledged the presentation and the farewell.

Kendal.—On Sunday, April 16, the pulpit of the Market-place Chapel was occupied by Dr. A. W. Martin, the Medical Officer of Health for Gorton, Manchester, who spoke to an appreciative congregation in the morning on "The Control of Infectious Diseases by the Vote," and his address was fully reported in the local newspapers. At the evening service he spoke on "The Gospel of Christ and Commercialism." On Thursday, the 20th inst., a sale of work was opened by the Rev. H. V. Mills, the proceeds of which are to be divided between the Sunday-school funds and the Home Missionary College at Manchester. At the close of the day it was announced that a sum of £19 had been realised.

Killinchy.—The annual soirée was held on April 25, when there was an attendance of over four hundred, smaller than usual owing to the lateness of the season. The chairman, the Rev. Joseph Geary, read apologies from Principal Gordon, Rev. J. H. Bibby, and others. An excellent programme was provided consisting of glees, songs, recitations, violin and gramophone selections and speeches. The Rev. J. J. Magill, in a vigorous speech dealing with religious Revivals, emphasised the necessity for honesty, truth, and straightforwardness. The Rev. Richard Lyttle advocated the claims of the new College Buildings in Manchester in an enthusiastic way; and the National Anthem closed a very successful meeting.

Kilmarnock.—A remarkable series of meetings, with a view to what was called "A Revival of Religion on Broad Church lines," was held in Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church, from Sunday, April 9, to Friday, April 14, conducted by Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton, and Dr. John Hunter, of Glasgow; Dr. Hunter closing the series by an inspiring sermon on "The Love that does not let go."

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—A quarterly conference was held at the Banks-street Church, North Shore, Blackpool, on Saturday afternoon and evening, April 29. Most of the churches in the Association were represented, visitors coming from Kendal on the one hand and Chorley on the other. A distinctive feature of the gathering was a choral convention of the choirs of congregations composing the Association. This was held after tea and was very well attended. The Rev. J. Channing Pollard, of Lancaster, was in the chair, supported by the Revs. R. McGee and H. V. Mills. During the proceedings short addresses of encouragement to the churches were given, and at the close of a very profitable assembly Mr. E. S. Heywood, of St. Annes, the secretary to the Association, proposed a cordial vote of thanks to all who had taken part, and he in turn was thanked from the chair for his interest in the organisation of the gathering.

Southend.—The services during May and June are being conducted by Mr. George Ward.

Southern Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meeting of the executive was held at Hill-street Church, Poole, on Wednesday, April 19, followed by tea in the schoolroom and a public meeting in the church. At the evening meeting the chair was taken by Mr. Charles Carter, C.C., who made sympathetic reference to the loss the Association had sustained in the death of Mr. J. Cogan Conway, who had been their president for so many years, and expressed his pleasure that Rev. C. C. Coe had consented to take up the duties of the office. Referring to the difficulty of filling their churches, he suggested that possibly greater elasticity in the form of their services and sermons dealing directly with the problems of everyday life might be found helpful in solving this problem. Rev. H. Rawlings, as a visitor, associated himself with much that the chairman had said, and went on to call attention to the wide diversity in origin and training of those who had been drawn into our churches, and especially into the ministry. Men of all types of experience, from the Roman Catholic to the Quaker, had been drawn in. All had come because they felt there was more truth in the new faith than in the old, and all had brought with them more or less of habit, or custom, or belief from the church they had left, and so had added to that diversity which was in one way a glory and in another a weakness. Rev. C. C. Coe urged that the loss the district had sustained in the death of Mr. Conway, and the removal of Mr. Bushrod should stimulate those who yet remained to greater faithfulness and more determined effort. Rev. J. Burton and Mr. F. Pinnock also addressed the meeting, which was well attended and hearty in tone.

South Shields.—Anniversary services were conducted in Unity Church on Easter Sunday by Mr. Thomas Manning, of York. The annual tea and public meeting were held on Easter Tuesday; also a sale of work, which proved very successful. In the unavoidable absence of the Mayor of Newcastle-on-Tyne (Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J. P.), the evening meeting was presided over by Mr. T. F. Bolam (the president of the church), and the Rev. Frank Walters gave a very eloquent and encouraging address. The Revs. F. Wood and G. A. Ferguson, and Mr. V. Errington, of Newcastle, also addressed the meeting.

Sunderland.—The series of special Sunday evening services, which have been held here under the auspices of the Northumberland and Durham Association, were concluded on Sunday, April 16. The special preachers during the latter part of the course were Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead, whose subject was "The Perfection of God"; the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Holbeck, who spoke on "Christ's Doctrine of the Church"; and Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, president of the District Association, whose theme was "Religion without Ritual or Dogma."

Wakefield.—The centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth was celebrated in Westgate Chapel on Sunday evening. A portrait of Dr. Martineau, in a finely carved oak frame, was placed within the communion enclosure, and over it a floral arch of white and green, with masses of garden and conservatory flowers on either side and over the communion table. The service was chiefly musical, Dr. Martineau's own hymns and one of his canticles being sung and memorial anthems and a litany of commemoration being impressively rendered by a large choir. The address was given by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers on "The Master Mind of the Nineteenth Century."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society, to be held at Essex Church on Tuesday evening next, should be of special interest. The chair is to be taken at eight o'clock by Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., and among the announced speakers is Mr. F.W. Pethick Lawrence, editor of the Echo, and (with Mr. Joseph Edwards) of the Reformer's Year Book. Apart from any special speakers, this is a meeting which should receive the strongest support from the members of our churches.

UNDER the auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, a public meeting is to be held at the Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo-road, S.E., on Friday evening, May 19, at 8.30 o'clock. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will take the chair, and the Mayor of Woolwich (Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, J.P.), and Mr. Richard Montford (Organising Agent, United Kingdom Alliance) are announced to speak. There will be choruses, solos, recitations, &c., by the choir of the Stamford-street Temperance Society.

THE annual meetings of the Congregational Union have been held in London this week. Dr. P. T. Forsyth delivered his address as Chairman on Tuesday morning, taking for his subject, "A Holy Church the Moral Guide of Society." Published as a threepenny pamphlet, the address occupies 68 pages, and only a part of it was actually delivered. Both the theoretical and the practical part should receive careful attention, and we shall return to the subject of the Address. "Our prominent preachers," said the President, "never seem to face final "questions. Audiences do not seem to "welcome them, and the press evades "them. But they face us. They will "not be evaded. And among them the "moral problem is the problem of the "hour and of the future. For it is the "whole social problem. It is the issue on "which civilisation depends for its per-"manence; and yet it is the problem "which civilisation alone is least able to "solve. But it is the problem on whose "solution Christianity stands or falls. A "Christianity which is out of relation to "it is a false Christianity, however pious "it may be; it is unscriptural, however "Biblical; it is hollow, however popular; "and it is inhuman, in fact, however "sympathetic it may sound in tone." How thoroughly Dr. Forsyth dealt with his subject readers of the address will see. The Rev. J. H. Jowett is the Chairman-elect for 1906.

MR. JOWETT, the new chairman of the Congregational Union is a young man for the post, but a strong one. When he succeeded the late Dr. Dale at Carr's-lane, Birmingham, doubts were expressed whether he would prove equal to the task. The doubts are long laid to rest, and this is evidence that he was not like Dr. Dale, but was like himself, which is a first qualification if a man is to do sterling work. And now again he is called to a hard billet. The coming year is the first of the newly constituted Union, and its future will be largely determined by its first chairmen, Dr. Forsyth and Mr. Jowett. This is the more true owing to the serious loss sustained in the sudden death of the Rev. J. A. Mitchell, the late secretary of the Union, who simply wore himself out by sixteen months of tremendous work. Before taking up this work Mr. Mitchell had been Principal of the Nottingham Institute, where his presence proved to many of his men the power of manhood, and where he gave, what young men need so much, a consciousness of the hero.

THE logic of events is forcing some of the evangelical leaders to recognise the impossibility of ending the long and disastrous theological wrangle over the elementary Schools in any other way than by secular State education. Dr. Horton is now to be added to their number. At present the interests of the children are being made, in Dr. Horton's words, the football of contending religious factions :—

"More and more it seems to me "possible that the whole difficulty lies in "the State—under modern conditions— "attempting to give religious instruction. "The interests are so divided, and the "jealousies are so keen, that, if educa-"tion is to be efficient and national, it "must go its way unhampered by the "religious question. And, speaking as a "Christian, I am inclined to think that "when the Church—in the broad sense "of that term—finds that on her alone, "and not on the State, rests the onus of "religious teaching, she will wake to a "new zeal, and find a new power.

"I wished to say something of this "sort, because, after trying for months to "find in my own mind a workable com-"promise, I feel that the time is coming "when not compromise, but a clear, "logical issue will best serve the educa-"tional cause."

THE conflict, however, is as yet far from an end. The great Wesleyan body is still committed to the peculiar form of sectarianism at the public expense, known as simple Bible teaching. This, at least, is the case as far as they are represented by the Rev. Scott Lidgett, whose letter to the Daily News breathes out threatening against any Liberal Government which dares to adopt Dr. Horton's clear logical issue.

WE have noticed from time to time the difficulties experienced by Cheshunt College—difficulties caused by an obsolete trust deed which men do not believe and may not deny. The Board of Education refused to sanction the proposal to amalgamate with Hackney College. The trustees, thus frustrated in their first device, have now submitted a proposal for removing their College to Cambridge, and intend to bring in a Bill in Parliament to alter the offending theological clauses. The growing desire to connect our ministerial schools with the Universities is full of interest, and in the case of Manchester and Mansfield, has been amply justified.

ONE difficulty suggests itself to us in the case of Cheshunt—the prosaic but not unimportant one of finance. The original plan of amalgamation rose from the lack of funds to maintain Cheshunt in isolation in anything like the front rank of such institutions. At Cambridge they will require more rather than less wealth than they have had in their present home. But it may well be that this bolder policy will touch the imagination of new donors, and that when larger subscriptions are wanted they will not be found wanting.

THE following is the full text of the memorial which is being offered for signature to the clergy of the Church of England, to which Dr. Drummond referred in his speech at Oxford last week. The paper as sent out to the clergy for signature was marked "private and confidential," and it has not yet been published by the promoters of the movement. But it has, perhaps inevitably, got into the papers, and we therefore now reproduce it here, as printed recently in the Guardian :—

"We, the undersigned clergymen of the Church of England—observing (a), on the one hand, the present unsettled condition of religious opinion, which, while due in the main to the general trend of modern thought, specially connects itself for the clergy with the critical study of the New Testament, and (b), on the other hand, a counter-tendency to treat the full discussion of many questions arising from such study as inadmissible for our Church, and so to commit us as a body to non-critical views of the New Testament Scriptures—desire to record :—

"(1) Our sense of the grave and manifold issues involved in the present critical discussions, and of the urgent need for English Churchmen to combine an earnest faith in the Holy Spirit Who guides into all truth, with as earnest an effort to contribute to a solution of these problems ;

"(2) Our desire that, as many of the clergy have already, with advantage to Christian faith and with a general assent on the part of their rulers, welcomed important results of a patient, reverent and progressive criticism of the Old Testament, so the clergy, as Christian teachers, may now receive authoritative encouragement to face the critical problems of the New Testament with entire candour, reverence for God and His truth, and loyalty to the Church of Christ ;

"(3) Our fear lest the door of Ordination should be closed to men who patiently and reverently apply historical methods to the Gospel records, and so an increasing number of men, both spiritually and intellectually qualified should be lost to the high office of the ministry ;

"(4) Our conviction that it is not without grave responsibility and peril that any of us should build the faith of souls primarily upon details of New Testament narrative, the historical validity of which must ultimately be determined in the court of trained research—although many of us, until such final decision take shape, may cling devotedly to the traditional details in question ;

"(5) Our confidence that the faith of the Church in the years to come, whatever historical revisions may await us, will stand, without risk and without discontinuity, upon the spiritual foundations to which Christian experience and the Creed of the Church alike bear testimony."

"MAY I not do what I like with my own?" No, you may not, unless your liking and your duty are in happy accordance. Morally you are as much bound to distribute your own wealth wisely, as to abstain from touching another man's.—Martineau.

EASTER IN BUDAPEST.

IT may interest your readers to know how our Hungarian friends keep Easter. At home in England, Easter is a time for pleasant trips to the country or the seaside, and half-empty churches show that the sacred character of the holy-days is not uppermost in the minds even of very many church-goers. But here it is different, for the Hungarian takes Easter seriously. To him it is perhaps the most sacred period in the whole year, and people who but rarely attend church do not fail to go then. The two most important days are Friday and Saturday. "Great Friday" for the Lutherans, and "Great Saturday" for the Roman Catholics.

On Friday morning I went to the Lutheran church. Can I ever forget that old church where, two years ago, a sweet Hungarian woman became my wife? It was packed with people. Every available standing-place on the floor of the building and its two galleries was taken, and there was scarcely room to breathe. First, at ten o'clock, came the service in German, then the Hungarian service at eleven. The church is a plain rectangular structure, with little ornamentation, and it was draped in black. The scene was solemn, mournful perhaps, for Christ's death is the aspect of Easter most prominent with the Lutherans. I afterwards walked into various Catholic churches, the beautiful Matthias Church, five hundred years old, which crowns the heights of Buda, and the old Plébánia Church, used by the Turks during their occupation of Hungary as a mosque. Here might be seen an image of Christ lying in the tomb. It was an elaborate tableau. The tomb appeared to be hewn out of the rock. Around was foliage, amidst which gleamed variously coloured lights, and real soldiers with drawn swords guarded the sepulchre. A dense stream of people passed before the tomb, throwing coins of various amounts into the sacred inclosure.

On Saturday, about six o'clock, I made my way to the church of the Szervita Fathers. According to the Hungarians, Christ rose on Saturday evening. Again dense crowds of people, who waited in silent awe for the resurrection. The hour struck, music came from some unseen band, and a procession of priests and others marched down the church and disappeared from view. Soon the procession reappeared, to the tinkling of bells and the swinging of censers, and in his arms a priest carried an image, some two feet in height, of the risen Christ. Here the note was one of joy ; banners waved, a thousand lights shed their brightness, and sweet incense filled the air, for the Catholics lay more stress on the resurrection than on the death of Christ. After the service, from all the churches there streamed processions through the streets, with military bands, and maidens dressed in bridal attire, and always with the image of the risen Christ. No theatres or other places of amusement are allowed to be open on either Friday or Saturday.

On Sunday morning, at 10 o'clock, I went once again to the Szervita Church. Not only was the building packed, but a large crowd was also assembled outside. This I joined, and in course of time managed to gain the porch of the church. Here the voices of the finest operatic singers were to be heard. The wonderful music, the banners and lights, and the sea of faces made a most imposing ensemble. It was strange to pass from this gorgeous scene to the simple Unitarian church where our friend Mr. Józan was preaching. Here, too the building was crowded, for on Easter Sunday the Unitarians in and around Budapest make a point of going to church. Three or four Sundays before I counted scarcely thirty worshippers. Now there were hundreds, leaving hardly any standing room. Of the sermon I am unable to speak, but it appeared to be eloquent. The service, however, was not bright enough. It commenced with a hymn, sung with incredible slowness, during which all sat. Then followed a Bible reading and a prayer, during both of which we stood. Next came the sermon and another hymn.

The Sunday morning in Budapest is given to church-going, but in the evening the churches are shut, and all is gaiety. Cafés and theatres are crowded. Thousands flock to the Városliget, or People's Park. There is music, brightness, merriment everywhere.

On Easter Monday it is the custom for young men and boys to go round to their lady friends to sprinkle them with water, and on the Tuesday the ladies return the compliment. In each case the sprinkled person is supposed to give to the sprinkler an egg. The origin of this custom is lost in antiquity, though various accounts are given. In all the shops and markets may be seen hundreds of the brightly coloured eggs which are used for this purpose.

CHAS. ARTHUR GINEVER.

Budapest, April 30.

"NOTHING is needed in religion," some say, "but the naked truth." But I apprehend that there is no such thing as naked truth, at least as far as moral subjects are concerned. Truth which relates to God, and duty, and happiness, and a future state, is always humanised, if I may so use the word, by passing through a human mind ; and when communicated powerfully, it always comes to us in drapery thrown round it by the imagination, reason, and moral feelings of the teacher. It comes to us warm and living with the impressions and affections which it has produced in the soul from which it issues : and it ought so to come ; for the highest evidence of moral truth is found in the moral principles and feelings of our nature, and therefore it fails of its best support unless it is seen to accord with and to act upon these. The evidence of Christianity which operates most universally is not history nor miracles, but its correspondence to the noblest capacities, deepest wants, and purest aspirations of our nature, to the cravings of an immortal spirit ; and when it comes to us from a mind in which it has discovered nothing of this adaptation, and has touched none of these springs, it wants one of its chief signatures of divinity. Christianity is not, then, to be exhibited nakedly. It owes much of its power to the mind which communicates it ; and the greater the enlargement and development of the mind of which it has possessed itself, and from which it flows, the wider and deeper will be its action on other souls.—Channing.

LITERATURE.

A STUDY OF ROMAN SOCIETY UNDER THE EMPIRE.*

I.

PROFESSOR DILL has adopted the unusual course of writing history backwards. After the remarkable success of his book on Roman Society in the last century of the Western Empire he has gone back to an earlier and more familiar period. His new book on Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius has all the qualities of literary charm and fine historical portraiture which marked the earlier volume; and it has this additional interest, that it supplies us, as no other book in English does in quite the same way, with a picture of the social and religious condition of the Empire at the time when Christianity was beginning to match its strength with paganism. There is no harder task for the writer of history, as there is none which requires a more finely balanced imagination, than the painting of the life of the obscure crowds of men, who built the cities and managed the trade of the ancient world. We can follow the course of the campaigns of Titus or Trajan, or the details of some base intrigue in the imperial household, or for a moment as in an electric flash we behold the brutal passions of the crowd in the amphitheatre; but behind it all there is a dull, undistinguished human background—a selva oscura—which few have had the patience or the skill to try to penetrate. It is in this direction that Professor Dill has special gifts of insight and sympathy. He sees the significance of the crowd; he has a real relish for the comédie humaine of the Roman world; and it saves him from the common mistake of taking all his colours from the palette of the satirist or confining his attention to an attractive literary set. Not that the latter is neglected by any means. His pages are bright with descriptions of Seneca and Plutarch and the younger Pliny, which have in them the flavour of a scholar's fine taste and his leisurely enjoyment. But it is his treatment of social and industrial movements, of municipal life, and the problems of a large urban population, which brings us something fresh, and sets the whole picture in a new perspective.

The three chapters on the Society of the Freedmen, Municipal Life, and the Colleges and Plebeian Life must have cost Professor Dill a large amount of labour. The evidence upon which he relies is drawn to a large extent from inscriptions, and this is evidence which has been made available only in recent years. We need hardly point out that it requires both patience and skill to sift this bewildering mass of detail, and that it is not every eye which can detect the hint of a new fact, which may be contained in half a dozen words. That Roman civilisation, like our own, was essentially urban is almost a commonplace, but it is a statement which has comparatively little meaning until we are able to reconstruct the actual life of a typical small town with its mixed population, its organised trades, its civic patriotism, and the means of transit which made travelling easy and kept it in close touch with the wider life of the province and the empire. "Perhaps nowhere," says Professor Dill, "had the 'Roman Peace' worked greater miracles of civic prosperity than in North Africa. That the population of Roman Africa was, in the period of the Empire, extraordinarily dense, appears from the number of its episcopal sees, which in the fifth century had reached a total of 297. The remains of more than twenty amphitheatres can still be traced. There is indeed no more startling proof of the range and sweep of Roman civilisation than the wreck of those capitols, forums, aqueducts, and temples in what are now sandy solitudes, not even occupied by a native village. In the province of Numidia, within a few leagues of the Sahara, the Roman colony of Thamugadi (Timgad) was founded, as an inscription tells, by Trajan in the year 100. There, in what is now a scene of utter loneliness and desolation, the remains of a busy and well-organised community have been brought to light by French explorers. The town was built by the third legion, which for generations, almost as a hereditary caste, protected Roman civilisation against the restless tribes of the desert. The chief buildings were probably completed in 117. The preservation of so much, after eighteen centuries, is a proof that the work was well and thoroughly done. The ruts of carriage wheels can still be seen in the main street, which is spanned by a triumphal arch, adorned with marble columns. Porticoes and colonnades gave shelter from the heat to the passers-by, and two fountains played at the further end. Water, which is now invisible on the spot, was then brought in channels from the hills and distributed at a fixed rate among private houses. The forum was in the usual style, with raised side-walks and porticoes, a basilica, a senate house and rostrum, a shrine of Fortuna Augusta, and a crowd of statues to the emperors from M. Aurelius to Julian. . . . The inscriptions on the site reveal the regular municipal constitution, with the names of seventy decurions, each of whom probably paid his honorarium of £13 or more when he entered on his office. The honours of the duumvirate and the aedileship cost respectively £32 and £24. And here, as elsewhere, the public monuments and buildings were generally erected by private ambition or munificence. A statue and little shrine of Fortuna Augusta were given by two ladies at a cost of over £200 in the days of Hadrian."

A picture like this, with its precise detail, is of great service in helping the reader to feel the reality, and in a sense the very atmosphere, of a vanished civilisation. It is its completeness, and the external splendour and finish which are the symbols of that completeness even in remote places, which strike us most. Nothing seems to have been overlooked that could minister to the comfort and self-satisfaction of a well-organised community, and this extended to all grades of the population. The lavish expenditure upon public objects is particularly striking, and often the money came not from the municipal coffers, but from the purse of the private citizen. Sometimes this was the expression of simple public benevolence, as in the case of Pliny, a not very rich man according to the standard of his day, as Professor Dill reminds us, who gave away more than £80,000 in beautifying his native town and endowing it with educational and charitable institutions. The tendency, however, was for these gifts to be exacted by public opinion, especially in the case of men who aspired to municipal honours. "There has probably seldom been a time when wealth was more generally regarded as a trust, a possession in which the community as a whole has a right to share." No doubt this was a healthy check upon its growing and predominant influence; but in the end the burden became too great, men of promise were driven out of local municipal affairs into the easier conditions of the imperial service, and the free civic life was merged in a bureaucratic régime.

The rapid growth of colleges, guilds or clubs as we should call them, is another sign of the power of the social instinct in Roman life. In no direction has the study of inscriptions yielded more fruitful results. It enables us to trace, during the period under review, the progress of a slow industrial revolution, the differentiation of a large number of organised trades, and the consequent decline of slavery. These clubs, like the guilds of the Middle Ages, had various functions. They were trade societies for the mutual protection of people engaged in the same occupation. They were often associated with religion, and had solemn ritual acts to perform. At other times they seem to have existed chiefly, to quote the words of Professor Dill, "for mutual sympathy and support, for relief from the deadly dulness of an obscure and sordid life," and the common weal became the symbol of brotherhood. Many of them were burial societies, and honour to the dead was the prevailing motive. Here, again, the resemblance to the mediæval guild is very striking. The inscriptions tell of bequests to keep the memory green and the mortuary lamp burning. There is something very pathetic in the prayer that the interest of some small legacy may be spent in strewing roses on the grave. It is the refusal of even the poorest and most forgotten life to accept the oblivion, which seemed to involve personal annihilation. One other feature must not be overlooked. There is evidence that in the management of these societies the slave was placed in a position of equality with the other members, an anticipation of one of the special privileges of the Christian church, though without its firm grasp of the underlying principle "in Christ there is neither bond nor free."

But when all this has been said we have not got much beyond the visible framework of society. We want to know what these people—not merely the thinkers and writers, but the undistinguished people of the crowd—thought and felt about religion, of what kind were their ideals, how they tried to relate themselves to spiritual experience, in what fashion they groped their way amid the mysteries of the Unseen. These and kindred questions, about which Professor Dill has a great deal to tell us, must form the subject of another article. For the present we must be content with asking whether his pages throw any light upon the problem, which arises continually to baffle and to oppress the student of a vanished civilisation. What was the cause of its failure? Must we take refuge in some theory of cyclic change or inscrutable decree? Or can we trace the source of the decay? This is a subject which Professor Dill treats in hints rather than in detail, but again and again his meaning gleams through in some swift epigram or a sentence of searching reflection. He speaks in memorable words of the "sad, clinging pessimism of Tacitus." He reminds us more than once of the brooding shadow of a materialised civilisation. There was no deep delight in life welling up from primal springs. Amid the growing tyranny of military rule, and the dark fear that hung over the outposts of empire, there were few if any hearts to feel that the world was young. Professor Dill does not turn history into prophecy, but the modern parallel, though it is treated with reticence, cannot be passed over entirely. There is much in these pages which gives point to the warning of Lucian, so calmly cynical and yet so terribly clear-sighted, "Great cities die as well as men."

W. H. D.

"THE SUPREMACY OF JESUS."*

"IF Christianity be true at all, it would be just as true if Herod or Catiline had taught it." This sentence, written by one who personally was filled with the most ardent veneration for Jesus, expresses in the extremest form a type of thought—in our opinion erroneous—which for some forty years seemed to become more and more generally accepted among Unitarians both in this country and in America. With a sincere admiration for the lofty ethics of the Gospels, those who held that view professed sometimes a certain indifference, if not to the central Figure moving through the Evangelists' records, at any rate to the personal element in Christianity: the teachings were everything—the personality of the Teacher occupied a comparatively secondary position. The trend of such a movement seemed to be towards a theism destined to become less and less distinctively Christian, and for that reason less and less capable of meeting the needs of ordinary humanity, however attractive to a small, exceptionally-endowed class.

In Dr. Crooker's eloquent and frequently beautiful pages we seem to discern, not indeed a return to the attitude towards Jesus characteristic of a Hamilton Thom, but at least a perceptible turning of the tide. He asks himself, "In what did the pre-eminence of Jesus consist?" and with the same decisiveness with which he repudiates the explanation which bases all upon a transactional doctrine of atonement, he rejects the view that the supremacy of Jesus is explicable as due to his teachings alone. Sublime as these are, he frankly states that—

"Even his 'sayings' do not describe or "explain his pre-eminence. . . . As "John Morley so well says: 'A man is "always so much more than his words.' ". . . The sayings of Jesus do much to "record, but little to explain, his power. "Our key to the problem is this: The "power of Jesus was not in what he "said, but in what he was. It flowed "from his rich and noble personality. . . . "It is the power of personality that trans-"forms and regenerates the world. . . . "It is said that the Gospels do not explain "the power of Jesus over man. Of course "they do not. They simply record the "fact. He explains them; they do not "explain him" (pp. 20-24).

We venture to think that in the passage just quoted Dr. Crooker strikes a note which has not been too frequently heard among us of late; and a good deal of the importance of his volume appears to us to lie in the evidence it affords of a certain change of tone which, should it grow general, may have consequences possibly far-reaching.

The significance of Dr. Crooker's emphasis upon the personality of Jesus is brought into relief by the thoroughness with which he accepts the results of the modern criticism of the Gospels, of which he supplies an admirably lucid sketch. He rightly reminds the reader of what is still very imperfectly appreciated, viz., that the Gospels are neither in fact nor were they even in intention, biographies of Jesus, as we understand the term, but written with devotional and even a propagandist purpose, comprehensible and legitimate enough in itself. Might not, by the way, a solution of the difficulty presented by the miraculous element in these documents be found in the suggestion that they belong to a well-known class of Jewish religious narrative, the hagadah, which does not purport to be history pure and simple, but Dichtung und Wahrheit? While Dr. Crooker abides whole-heartedly by the conclusions of a resolute criticism, he by no means thinks, as "rationalists" would have us do, that in the light of these Jesus is seen to be a shadowy, scarcely historical figure, but on the contrary expresses the eminently sane opinion that—

"The Gospels do become, in the hands "of modern scholars, in spite of all "apparent losses, both more interesting "and more instructive; and in a very "true sense, more historical. The figure "of Jesus becomes less mystical, but more "real. We may not be so sure as our "fathers were of some details, but we are "more certain of the large and heroic out-"line."

And in the same discriminating spirit, though rejecting the stories of a supernatural birth and bodily resurrection, he sees in these legends, instead of merely throwing them aside as an earlier type of criticism would have done, "first-class historical material" for estimating the quality and extent of the impression made by Jesus. The fact is, of course, that only of very great men are such stories told:—

"They are trustworthy testimonies, not "to the reality of certain incidents, but to "the quality and magnitude of Jesus's "character. . . . They are inadequate as "an explanation, but they are invaluable "as a revelation of his character. . . . "They (the birth stories) are not records "of his childhood, but products of his "life."

In the excellent chapter, "A New Appreciation of Jesus," we come upon the frank admission that "it is entirely rational to assume that a great spiritual genius would work cures upon the sick people about him," while it is rightly pointed out that the ethical superiority of Jesus is revealed by "the restraint which he put upon these 'powers' which he possessed," using them neither "to secure compensation, to obtain notoriety, to enforce his claims, to give authority to his message, or to win disciples." A very striking section in this chapter is that in which Dr. Crooker attempts to establish what is perhaps the least appreciated feature of Jesus, namely, his intellectual greatness. This part of the work is particularly well done, and was particularly well worth doing, as it affords a valuable supplement to the picture of Jesus existing in most minds.

From our acceptance of the ethical, Dr. Crooker argues with force and skill to that of the spiritual authority of Jesus; if his teachings concerning human conduct are provably right, that rightness establishes an a priori presumption in favour of the truth of his intuitions concerning the love of God and the immortality of the soul: "to go far enough to see what is eternally right between man and man is to go far enough to see the bonds that bind us to the Infinite." To have said so much is, it seems to us, to have already accepted in principle the essential truth implicit in the contention that we come to God through Christ.

We have purposely dwelt on some of the many points upon which we find ourselves in agreement with Dr. Crooker, rather than on those where we differ from him. In his eagerness to discover the historical Jesus, he does less than justice to the spiritual value of the Fourth Gospel, though he admits its "immense importance." In his repeatedly expressed distrust of mysticism and impatience of mystery, he shows that Martineau's famous and much resented criticism of his co-religionists' temper has not yet lost its truth. For this reason, i.e., because he is not in the least degree a mystic himself, Dr. Crooker's chapter on Jesus as "the Master of Inner Life," strikes us as the least satisfactory in the whole book. In his assumption that the same ready and intimate and direct communion which was possible to Jesus must therefore necessarily be equally possible to us—("If this was all that he needed to do, need we do any more? . . . Surely what was sufficient for him is sufficient for us")—he repeats the root fallacy which ignores the differences of endowment between highest genius and average humanity. Because Franz von Vecsy performs the most difficult compositions with consummate ease and feeling, therefore "surely" we ought to be able to do the same? Surely not.

But it is not upon a note of disagreement that we would close this notice of a volume marked everywhere by ability, sincerity, and enthusiasm for its subject. Dr. Crooker has produced an eminently readable book, "popular" in the best sense, and one which leaves us with a feeling of gratitude, not only as a performance, but also as a symptom.—J. WARSCHAUER.

"LIFE AND ENERGY."*

MR. HIBBERT essays in this little book to formulate what he regards as a new conception of Life, and apply it to morals and religion. The basis of the book is formed by four addresses given by him at the Polytechnic Institute, London, where he is head of the physics and electrical engineering department. His main thesis, viz., that Life is not energy, nor a factor of it, but only a directive control of energy, is perhaps not quite so new a conception as he imagines. It is in substance James Croll's contention in the Philosophical Magazine for July, 1872, and it has found various advocates during the last thirty-three years at least. With the enthusiasm of a discoverer, however, Mr. Hibbert imagines that he has at last got the key to the universe in his hands, and proceeds to show how it fits the locks of its various doors. The singular thing is that he does not perceive how many locks there are that it does not and cannot fit.

To begin with, he acknowledges that though Life is not energy, it yet has some relation to energy, and this relation is found to lie only in its ability to direct energy into paths otherwise impossible. This may perhaps be so, but then we need some explanation of the process of the transformation, or apparent transformation, of energy into vital and mental phenomena continually going on around us and in us. Herbert Spencer ("First Principles," chapter viii.) discusses the problem, and gives us his conclusion:—"Various classes of facts unite to prove "that the law of metamorphosis, which holds among the physical forces, holds equally between them and the mental forces . . . Motion, heat, light, chemical affinity, &c., are alike transformable into each other, and into . . . sensation, emotion, thought; these in their turns being directly or indirectly re-transformable into the original shapes. That no idea or feeling arises, save as a result of some physical force expended in producing it, is fast becoming a commonplace of science." This is a phase of the old problem of the relationship of mind and matter, a problem which is not solved by the simple thesis that life's only relation to energy "is found to lie in its ability to direct energy." This leaves almost everything unexplained, and a far deeper solution is required.

To take one other point—Mr. Hibbert applies his theory to the operations of the Divine Life, and conceives of God simply as a universal Directive Control, without energy, and related to all forms of energy simply as a Controller. This sets up a dualism in the universe at once. Eternal forces or energies exist side by side with an Eternal Directive Mind. And perhaps we ought to have a third factor, eternal matter. That is to say, the whole physical universe, all its material, all its energies, have nothing to do with God. He comes in simply as a controlling factor. The explanation of the world does not lie in the Absolute Spirit. Its existence and nature have nothing in common with His. It is too much to ask us to accept this as a final and satisfactory conception.

The book is suggestive, and written in an attractive style. The lectures from which it grew were apparently designed to help people to think for themselves, on a series of vitally interesting and important questions. In book form they will accomplish that object, whether the conclusions reached be accepted or not.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

DR. GEORGE BRANDES contributes to this month's Contemporary an article full of good stories and searching criticism and appreciation of Hans Christian Andersen. It is an astonishing picture he presents, from personal knowledge, of the perfectly open and childish egotism of the great story-teller, who found the centre of his happiness "in being admired." "He was incapable," writes Dr. Brandes, "of the conception that it befits a man, "and even a poet, for his life to consist "in something other than the praise or "blame of men. He never understood "that the admiration, like the opposition, "of others, not only leaves unmoved in "his inmost heart the man who works for "a cause or an idea, but likewise him "who has learnt, once and for all, his "powers and their limitations. There is "an excellent little verse by Paul Heyse "who puts this well:—

"Wer sich an Andre hält,
Dem wankt die Welt,
Wer auf sich selber ruht,
Steht gut."

Andersen's greatness was not in his intellectual power, but in his art. He was a perfect teller of stories, "simple, childlike, original, human." It is only a few perfect things in literature that can command immortality. "There is not room in the heavenly lumber-rooms for the whole life-work of a modern author. What does matter is that he should write one everlasting thing, be it ever so short, a thing that can never be forgotten, because the form of it is so exceedingly close and firm that no one can a sail it." Among such things, side by side with "Don Quixote," and "Robinson Crusoe," Dr. Brandes places a collection of the best of Andersen's fairy tales, and among these, in the first place, the story of the "Ugly Duckling," "in which everything that can be justly called his 'Life story' is explained in transfigured, imperishable form, and has not gained by being spread out into the thick and heavy book which bears this name."

In the same number Professor Lloyd Morgan writes on "The Interpretation of Nature," allowing full scope to the energies of "Naturalism," with the proviso that when its account of scientific order is complete there is more to be said, just as in our own life the conviction of personal identity and will-power and purpose must be admitted as among the fundamental facts. In Nature the recognition of Divine purpose is essential to a true interpretation. Canon Cheyne, in his brief article, "Has the clock stopped in Bible Criticism?" makes further and quite sufficient reply to Dr. Reich, at whose "levity" in dealing with questions of higher criticism he expresses not unnatural astonishment. Count S. C. de Soissons gives an interesting account of a "New Trend of Russian Thought," as represented by some recent idealist writers, of distinctly religious convictions.

In the Nineteenth Century and After, the Comte de Castellane writes on "The Separation of Church and State in France," arguing that its result can only be evil, and will lead the nation "to religious oppression, to revolution and civil war." The Concordat of 1802 really represents a condition which had existed for centuries in determining the relations of State and Church, and the genius of Napoleon simply adopted what he saw to be essential to the well-being of the country. The Church, he holds, must not be left uncontrolled by the State, nor should the State sever itself from religious influence. "True liberty springs only from the distinction and union of the two powers." In the same number Miss K. Bathurst (late Inspector under the Board of Education) writes on "The Need for National Nurseries," pleading for a revolution in infant school methods which should provide some real mothering for the babies in school, and much more natural and happier conditions for their proper management. As one item of help that may be given now, she makes the following suggestion:—

"Miss Fry (239, Marylebone-road, "London, W.) is secretary to a society "for providing ladies willing to go regu-"larly for one hour or two hours a week "to the neighbouring school under Article "68. They place their services at the "disposal of the head-teacher, and help "her by giving lessons in botany, gardening, geography, or even playing games. "If the public only knew how solitary "the lives of many schoolmistresses are, "I have no hesitation in saying that "the daughter of the squire or clergyman, "and possibly many others who find time "heavy on their hands, would gladly help "them. Such help can legally be given "at the present moment. I understand "that Mr. Rooper, late Inspector of "Schools for Hampshire and the Isle of "Wight, was personally interested in the "scheme, and if any of my readers appeal "to Miss Fry, they will obtain full in-"formation of how best to begin." Another suggestion is made as to the Happy Evening Association; but the whole article should be carefully considered.

The Independent Review is largely devoted to questions of social reform, as to which the opening notes on current events give clear indication of the Editors' mind. "It is not primarily in the interest of Liberalism itself," they say, "but in the interest of the masses cut off by the economic conditions of great cities and dwindling villages, from nearly all the sources of joy, of knowledge, and of self-cultivation, that we advocate Social Reform as the programme of modern Liberalism." After the notes comes "A Manifesto on the Taxation of Rural Land Values," and among the other articles is a strong protest by Dr. Macnamara on the Government's secondary education scheme, which he declares is hopelessly marred by class prejudice, and does not furnish the properly graduated steps of education open equally to all the people. Sir Lauder Brunton's article on "A League of Health" gives expression to a hope which should be fraught with great good for the people. Sir Edmund Verney's article on "Hodge and his Educators" has a suggestion of how the poor may turn the tables on the rich, and insist that the latter shall be properly educated, for the benefit of the whole community. Mr. A. G. Pigou, writing on "The Optimism of Browning and Meredith," is in a different field. He argues that the optimism of neither poet can be logically justified, and yet at the end begins to hold out a crumb of comfort, which, however, he keeps in a tantalising way beyond our reach. We are inclined to think that Browning was nearer the truth than he.

MUSINGS.

By A Minister.

XVIII.

If I had the pen of an Addison, I would write a paper on the books which once amused. They stand as thick as the tombs in Westminster Abbey, and are nearly as mournful to reflect upon. The wit which was their soul has gone out of them, and only the poor tenement which held the liveliness that was their life remains.

That the power to sadden should outlive the power to amuse is at first sight one of those freaks of fortune which make the hardships of literary life. Tragedy rarely fails to move successive generations; it is comedy that loses its point. There are pathetic passages in Homer, and, later on, in Euripides, which are as affecting now as when they were first written; but the interludes of jest seem hardly worthy of a smile; just as in Shakespeare, later still, the Hermiones and Ophelias melt us to tears, whilst the clowns grow wearisome with time. But the truth is that mirth is more artificial, more dependent on art, than sorrow, and is therefore more constantly corrected by taste. Elia says that some of the old plays ceased to be amusing when they were thought to be immoral. The immorality which was not really in them was read into them. In the same way, I suppose, in literary frolic, that is no longer found to be witty which is felt to be improper. It is certainly remarkable that in the New Testament the readiness of the Greek becomes ribaldry to the Christian, for so we must understand the "jesting" which is not "befitting."

In many cases, however, the power to charm us into gaiety is lost, not through impropriety, but through inappropriateness. The play of old-world fancy cannot now be adapted to anything with which we have acquaintance. The causes of grief are always reproducing themselves, and the circumstances are those of general experience, but the occasions of laughter are woven in with time and place and particular event. The fun lies mostly in a certain situation of things, and demands a certain position of the reader towards them. The books which once amused assumed a special prepossession. To taste parody, you must know the flavour of the thing parodied; to enjoy satire, you must know its history; to enter into burlesque, you must know its machinery. There are parodies and satires and burlesques I could name which will never cease to be read, and in a sense will always please, but they have lost for this age their power to amuse. They are studied, not read, and the student may feel a pleasurable interest, but he does not hold his sides.

The wit which is most short-lived is that of personal spleen. You find it in Swift, in Pope, in Voltaire, even in Milton. At the same time the scurrility which writes itself in Latin, as in Milton's case, need not be judged too seriously; it is a display of learning rather than of feeling—a learning which on occasion can add the slang of the crossways to the polished diction of the forum, and be proud to do it. How different the raillery which lightly touches types and classes, but never flouts individual men! The wit we love best is that which shows us how humour and humanity may laugh together, and, because it is loved, it lives long. Malignity, on the other hand, loses even its pungency, and is best punished when, sooner or later, it is voted dull. There is much that is humorous in the Bible, but the absence of ridicule may almost be taken as one of the proofs of its inspiration.

As I began with Addison's name, so I may end with those words of praise which are his true epitaph, though they are not inscribed on his tomb: "The unsullied statesman, the accomplished scholar, the master of pure English eloquence, the consummate painter of life and manners, the great satirist, who alone knew how to use ridicule without abusing it; who, without inflicting a wound, effected a great social reform, and who reconciled wit and virtue, after a long and disastrous separation, during which wit had been led astray by profligacy, and virtue by fanaticism."

THIS COMPOST.

Something startles me where I thought I was safest,
I withdraw from the still woods I loved,
I will not go now on the pastures to walk.

O how can it be that the ground itself does not sicken?
How can you be alive you growths of spring?

These words of Whitman may well recur to the husbandman as he digs and dungs his land and sets his tilth a-growing. Life leaps with the winds over the changing hills and the sun draws the odour of creation out of the soil. And yet

I am terrified at the Earth, it is that calm and patient.
It grows such sweet things out of such corruptions,
It distils such exquisite winds out of such infused fetor,
It renews with such unwitting looks its prodigal annual, sumptuous crops,
It gives such divine materials to men, and accepts such leavings from them at last.

Even so it is.

The summer growth is innocent and disdainful above all those strata of sour dead.
What chemistry!
That the winds are really not infectious,
That the cool drink from the well tastes so good,
That when I recline on the grass I do not catch any disease,
. . . That all is clean for ever.

What chemistry indeed! What miracle of transformation! What magic change of irksome rubbish into glory! What redemption of life from the grasp of death! Once more the heaven-born Herakles rescues Alkestis from the tomb.

O but it is all simple enough, says one. It is just a question of solution and oxidisation, a little more heat-energy, and the tireless industry of the invisible microbe. He who will may call it simple, and may think he understands. At least it is wonderful and beneficent, and we understand not the process, though we are blessed by the result. Now, at any rate, the order is not "change and decay," as the pensive poet thought he saw in everything around him, but decay being changed into life, which is quite another thing; the earth for ever rolling round to meet the sun, whose fire and life ever burneth, while the diligent worm, whose service is the same, dieth not. And so, with ages of evil behind and ages of evil before us, the pursuing good frustrates the wrong and prevents it from making one ultimate foot's advance. There is a power which insists on healing all our diseases, and on forgiving all our iniquities.

Not the earth only, but human nature too, is a very strange, but withal an inspiring compost. The world was never a Garden of Eden which became degraded into a wilderness. Man took his start not in a high estate from which he fell. He is a rudiment in a rudimentary world. Both are being constrained towards perfection. Cast what you will into the earth, she only retorts with a smile of beneficent irony. "We rend her bosom and she gives us bread." Cast what you will into the heart of man—the fierceness of the tiger, the subtlety of the serpent, the greed of the swine, the poison of poverty and the poison of wealth—he "counts it all dung" and grows you goodlier crops of all the virtues. "I cannot understand the frightful amount of evil in the world," said my dolorous neighbour some time ago. Since then he has been at work with his fork in his garden and discovered that the riddle is the riddle of manure. He has found himself mixed up in a strange compost, an amalgam of sweet and sour on which he nevertheless stakes his hopes, and which cheers him with pleasant reveries of spinach and asparagus. He talks facetiously at times about a few more barrow-loads of "sin" required here and there for the quickening of the life of the vegetable. We are rather elaborate vegetables, he now surmises. All things work together in the heart of the sot as they do in the heart of the sod. The criminal on the scaffold is on his way to the kingdom of heaven, as Emerson said. Calvinism is true—on the bright side. The earth is predestined to beauty, man is predestined to goodness. He is free to grow, and, like pity standing before opportunity, he cannot resist. "I will call them my people who were not my people and her beloved who was not beloved." No height of folly or depth of shame shall separate man from the love of God. We consume our sins as earth her fallen leaves.

Thanks to the Catholic for his doctrine of Transubstantiation. It is essentially true, though not only or exactly as he interprets it. What is there that may not be raised to a higher order as bread into the flesh and blood of man, of Christ? We, too, poor millions, in the summer-prime of the spirit may yet be made men of, and perfected men too.

The cynics and pessimists are commonly correct in their observations, but short-sighted in their inferences. The evils they detect are not to be denied. Deny them at your peril. You will make wrong right and right wrong if you do. But deny their finality stoutly as you would deny the finality of a dung-heap quâ dung-heap. Deny to evil the last word in the argument or that it stands for finis to the Book of Life. All sin, disease, suffering, and disorder are real and bad in themselves. But they are good for something else. They are indispensable fertilisers. We shall all be changed—though not in the twinkling of an eye. All is being made clean, forever and forever—clean as the clouds which are fogs till they soar; sweet as the haying which follows the flood.

It is worth noting, too, in this relation, how little tendency there is in evil of any kind to accumulate. The earth is never suffocated with dust and ashes. We have gathered blue-bells with the children in a hazel-copse which goes by the name of the Ash-hills—doubtless the rubbish-heap once of a neighbouring Sussex furnace. The errors of men are dropt by the way and forgotten. Their fresh-found truths, their mellower customs, their fairer laws, tend to take root and appeal to our fostering care. Them we keep, for they are worthy.

Your own life will illustrate for you the principle. In what confusion and trouble you have been sometimes. You have lost your way in the tangle of perplexities, lost hope in the midst of disappointment. You could not see your way out. You came to feel that if there were a way out you had not sufficient concern for your own good left to avail yourself of it. You did nothing to expel the demon. And yet he went. There was a bright power within you in whose company he could not stay. The peevish child finds that it has but a little cistern of tears, and, though in its petulance it would like to go on crying, the attempt fails. Against its will it keeps step with its own nature, which marches to music, and so presently it finds itself cheerful and good.

The oldest of us is but a child, and, petulant as we may be at ill-fortune, the stress of beautiful order works its own way back through the heart, the magnified pain re-assumes its rigid proportion The fire dies out, as fires will do. Our sins become insipid, and at last we fling them away in disgust. We have not measured the strength of the redeemer we possess in our own souls, and who fights for us in spite of the indifference of our wills. Do you stand aghast at this compost of human nature? Is it full of wounds and bruises, as the prophet said? Stay. You shall find it presently wholesome as the summer grass, and as free from moral infection as the west wind coming over the sea.

FLOWERS IN HISTORY—II.

DAISY: "BE FAITHFUL AND GRATEFUL."

THE daisy is a very little, very humble flower, and though a great many people are fond of it, a great many more scarcely notice it at all, and never think how much we should miss it. But of one thing I am sure, and that is that all children love the daisies. Think how dull the smallest strip of grass in a garden would be without the daisies, or a bit of common land, where no other flowers ever spring up. One of the daisy's greatest charms is that nothing ever damps its ardour. No matter how many times the gardener mows the lawn, and the poor little flowers fall by dozens under the machine, up they spring again after the first shower of rain, and sprinkle the grass with their little smiling faces as cheerfully as ever.

They are the very first wild flowers that come to us in the spring, and the very last to wither away in the autumn. They well deserve that they should be taken as the emblem of faithfulness, for few other flowers are so faithful to us in all places and in all seasons. It seems as if the daisy was a well-known flower in the very earliest days of English history. There is a pretty legend about it which dates back to the days when the Romans settled in our country.

While the Romans were persecuting and putting to death all those who had become Christians, there grew up a mother and sister, who were so wise and so beloved that the people called them saints. One day the brother, Saint Druon, said to his sister Saint Olle: "Sister, we are living in terrible days. I must die at my post if it is so ordered, and without fear and murmuring must await whatever Heaven sends. But thou, my child, art not strong enough to incur the dangers that lie before us. Thou must leave me, and seek a refuge where thou canst pray to God in safety."

At first Saint Olle refused to go, but after a while she yielded to her brother's wishes, and left him, hoping to find a safe home somewhere with friendly people. At the end of a year, another Roman was ruling, who did not persecute the Christians at all, and Saint Druon thought his sister might safely return home to him. But it was difficult to know how he could let her hear this, for he did not know where she had taken shelter, whether it was near, or very far away. Full of confidence that God would show him the way to her, he started out to seek her and took the first straight path that lay before him. Although it was now very late in the autumn it struck him that there were many little flowers springing out of the earth, along the path he followed. He looked closer and saw that they had golden centres, surrounded by a crown of white rays, and it suddenly flashed into his mind that Saint Olle had always loved these particular little flowers. He wandered on until it became night, and still these little tufts of daisies kept springing up before him as he walked, shining almost like little stars in the dim light.

"Ah!" he thought, "Saint Olle loved them: perhaps they love her in return, and are striving to show me the way to her."

So he followed where the daisies led, and after nine days' wandering, he reached a lonely spot in a forest, where, with some poor half-wild forest folk, who had gladly sheltered her, he at length found his sister, guided to her by the faithful and grateful little flowers she had loved.

It is nice to think how many of our Scotch and English poets have written about the daisy, so that it has a place in literature as well as in history. Chaucer called it the "Day's Eye," because its flowers close their petals at night, and in his quaint old English, he says it is "of all flouris, the floure."

Then there is a building in London where the daisy has its own place in history, where you can see it as well as hear about it, and that is Westminster Abbey. Do any of you know Henry the Seventh's beautiful chapel? At the entrance are some curious bronze gates, with some strange and interesting devices on them, hammered out in brass more than four hundred years ago. Amongst these, you will see a little pot of daisies, which Henry the Seventh caused to be placed there in memory of his mother. He was very devoted to her, and her name was Margaret, or Marguerite, which is the French for Daisy. Her second name was Beaufort, and the badge of the Beaufort family was a portcullis which you can see also on the gates. But Henry was not content to show only that his mother was a Beaufort. He wanted to have a special badge of her own, that did not belong to anyone else in the family. So, as her name was Margaret he chose the daisy for her badge, and had it put upon the gates. There you can see it, a little humble flower another sign that it should make us try to be faithful to those we love.

FLORENCE LAWFORD.

TO THE DAISY.

BRIGHT Flower! whose home is everywhere,
Bold in maternal Nature's care,
And all the long year through the heir
Of joy and sorrow—
Methinks that there abides in thee
Some concord with humanity,
Given to no other flower I see
The forest thorough!

Is it that Man is soon deprest?
A thoughtless Thing! who, once unblest,
Does little on his memory rest,
Or on his reason,
And Thou wouldst teach him how to find
A shelter under every wind,
And hope for times that are unkind
And every season?

Thou wander'st the wide world about,
Uncheck'd by pride or scrupulous doubt,
With friends to greet thee, or without,
Yet pleased and willing;
Meek, yielding to the occasion's call,
And all things suffering for all,
Thy function apostolical
In peace fulfilling.

AN ABIDING INSPIRATION.

THE commemoration, both at Norwich and at Manchester College, Oxford, of the centenary of JAMES MARTINEAU, of which our columns during the past weeks have contained a full record, has afforded ample opportunity for us to realise afresh how great are the gifts we have received from him, and what abiding inspiration there is in his memory, and in the rich treasures of his works. And of this we gain fresh assurance from Mr. CARPENTER'S new book,* the publication of which we briefly noted last week. The "Life and Letters," published by Dr. DRUMMOND and Professor UPTON, in the autumn of 1902, remains the indispensable standard work, which all must read who would be admitted to the intimacy of this great mind, for the story of his life is there fully told and abundantly illustrated by his own letters, while his teaching is interpreted by a master hand; and we rejoice that the two volumes can now be bought at a price † which places them within the reach of a much wider circle than at the time of their first publication. But to this it is a great gain that we can now add Mr. CARPENTER'S further study, and it is a happy thing that the three teachers who worked with Dr. MARTINEAU for so many years in Manchester College, and were all old students of his, have now had this opportunity of paying so noble a tribute to his memory.

Mr. CARPENTER'S book, it will be seen, is called "A Study of his Life and Thought." It tells the story of the life over again, with many fresh touches and a further store of letters used in welcome illustration, but what is specially notable in the book is the more elaborate setting of the story. Thus after the early life has been dealt with, up to the close of Dr. MARTINEAU'S Dublin ministry, when he was about to take up his new work in Liverpool, a solid chapter of sixty pages is introduced, describing the condition of "Religion and Philosophy in England, 1805—1832," so that we are able to picture to ourselves the kind of world into which the young preacher, with his fresh strength and splendid gifts, entered at that period, which was to be so momentous, not only in his own development, but in the history of the churches to the service of which he was devoted. And as the narrative proceeds, the condition of the churches, the crisis which arose with the Lady HEWLEY case, met by the Dissenters' Chapels Act, the phases of college controversy, the efforts to establish true relations of church fellowship, are kept clearly before the reader, while at the same time the inward history of the teacher is carefully traced. Not only the text, but the many footnotes bear witness with what elaborate care this study has been made, and we are thankful to feel that it is with true insight, and that we are brought nearer than ever to one whose presence was a strength and an inspiration to those who could hear his word, whose gracious influence must always make for what is pure and lofty and of strenuous purpose in human life.

In the splendid series of essays which Dr. MARTINEAU contributed to the Prospective Review from 1845 onwards, he for the first time laid down in public the broad lines of his ethical and philosophical teaching, afterward perfected in the great works given to the world forty years later. Of the teaching of those early essays Mr. CARPENTER gives a most interesting account, and thus states the fundamental position of the religious philosopher:—

"With him, as with CHANNING, 'that "man is endowed with knowledge of the "right, and with power to realise it, was "the fundamental axiom in his science "of human nature.'

"As this knowledge and power are the "inmost treasures of our personality, "their existence cannot be proved by "anything more certain. They are in- "tuitively discerned; they cannot be "scientifically demonstrated. Proof of "them, if proof is demanded, must "be found in the inadequacy of any "other explanation. On this proof "Mr. MARTINEAU was, at a later "day, to bestow much thought and care. "At this stage he is content to reiterate "the essential facts, and invest them with "that rich poetic glow, which constituted, "for a mind like his, the true medium "of vision. Here are mysteries to which "the language and law of all ages bear "testimony; they cannot be exhibited to "sense; they can only be represented to "the imagination. But they bear in their "midst sublime consequences. For the "soul that has once recognised its true "character, knows that it is entrusted "with responsible power. It is itself an "agent; it can produce events by its own "decisions; it is a fountain of energy; "there dwells in it the independence of "an originating cause. To awaken this "consciousness is the function of the "teacher: to exhibit all its contents, and "trace their far-reaching issues, is the "work of philosophy. The right interpre- "tation of Man carries with it the right "understanding of the world and God."

And again, having told of the great year in Germany, and what that meant in Dr. MARTINEAU'S life, Mr. CARPENTER quotes from the sermon at the opening of the new Hope-street Church in the autumn of 1849, in which, after picturing the conflict between the old mediæval conception of religion and modern unbelief, the preacher asked, "Who shall abide in peace the crash and conflict of this war?" and then made this reply:—

"He only, I believe, whose allegiance "is neither to the antiquated Past, nor "to the speculative Future; but to the "imperishable, the ever-present Soul of "man as it is; who keeps close, amid "every change, to the reality of human "nature which changes not; and who, "following chiefly the revelations of the "Divine Will to the open and conscious "mind, and reading Scripture, history, "and life by their interpreting light, feels "the serenity and rests on the stability "of GOD."

How the Teacher worked on that foundation, how his influence grew, what response his word met in the world of thought, what quickening power there was in his preaching, what profound spirit of helpfulness in his devotion, will be found amply illustrated in these pages.

We shall return next week, in a further notice, to Mr. CARPENTER'S book.

BE it ours, in all things human and divine, to keep the good heart of faith; and as we accept the clearness of a brother's face and the simplicity of his word, and the freedom of his affection, so to throw ourselves open to the expression of God's life and love, in the beauty of the world, in the law of conscience, in the ample range of thought and aspiration, and in the promises, already pressing to fulfilment, of saints and prophets. It is never a good sign, be it remembered, when doubts beset us founded on no better reason than that the thing in question is "too good to be true." The suggestion, we may then be sure, is not from our best and noblest mind; and should be dealt with, less as an honest plea, than as a low temptation, and swept away as an ungenial mist, by a breath of fresh affection, clearing the stars again. There can be no pure intellectual eye for heavenly truth, till this meaner order of moral suspicions is dismissed, with the quick and resolute prayer "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief!"—Martineau.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

DURING the Martineau Centenary celebration at Oxford there was a meeting of the National Conference Committee, the proceedings of which will be of interest to our readers. Mr. A. W. Worthington, who has been an hon. secretary of the Conference since its establishment in 1882, has found it necessary, from considerations of health, to relinquish office, and Mr. Chas. Fenton, his colleague in later years, retired at the same time. No doubt the Conference, at the first opportunity, will recognise the eminent services rendered by its late hon. secretaries. Meanwhile the Committee, with the greatest cordiality, passed the following resolution :—

"That this Committee gratefully recalls "the long and devoted services of Mr. A. "W. Worthington and Mr. Charles Fenton "in the office of hon. secretaries to the "Conference. Mr. Worthington was "actively concerned with its first estab-"lishment, was one of its most zealous "guides through its earlier and difficult "years, bestowed on its whole course un-"tiring attention, and gained an intimate "knowledge both of its internal business, "and of the congregations composing it, "which has been of the utmost advantage "in the deliberations of the committee. "On Mr. Fenton devolved the chief share "in organising the triennial meetings "since 1891, and he has conducted all their "arrangements with unfailing courtesy and "precision; and during the large expansion "of the operations of the Committee since "1900 he has cheerfully borne the added "burdens which have recently fallen "upon the secretariate. To both gentlemen "this Committee offers its sincerest acknow-"ledgments, trusting that their connection "with the Conference may long be con-"tinued for the promotion of the welfare "of the congregations and the cause of "freedom by the truth."

Fresh arrangements thus became necessary, and on the invitation of the Committee the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., has accepted the office of secretary until the triennial meetings next year. All communications on Conference business should therefore now be addressed to him (at 105, Palace-road, Tulse Hill Park, London, S.W.)

The following resolution was also passed on the lamented death of Mr. J. Cogan Conway, who was a member of the Committee :—

"That this Committee, at their first "meeting after the death of their col-"league, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, would "hereby record their deep sense of his per-"sonal integrity and singleness of purpose, "and especially of the invaluable service "rendered by him to our churches both "in his generous devotion to the welfare "of the congregations of the Southern "Unitarian Association, and especially "to the congregation at Ringwood, of "which he undertook the ministry, and in "promoting the establishment of the "Ministers' Pension Fund, which will "endure as a monument of his indomitable "perseverance, benevolence, and wisdom. "The Committee desire respectfully to "convey to Mrs. Conway their sincere "sympathy in her affliction and bereave-"ment."

The President of the Conference (Mr. W. B. Bowring), the late President (Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A.), and the secretary were appointed representatives at the international meetings to be held at Geneva in August next.

Further, it was decided to hold the next meeting of the Conference at Oxford, on April 17, 18, 19, and 20, 1906. Easter week has hitherto not been considered a convenient time for the meetings, but it is believed that a great many people who go from home at that time will be very glad to combine a holiday visit to Oxford with attendance at the meetings. During the University vacation there is an abundance of lodgings to be had on most moderate terms. This is an important consideration, since Oxford friends, who are taking the matter up with enthusiasm, cannot be expected to provide the private hospitality which has been possible in larger centres. The meetings promise to be of especial interest. Oxford is a delightful place to meet in, and no doubt, with this timely notice, a large gathering may be anticipated.

The Committee also resolved to invite delegates from the various trusts, funds, and societies which assist churches, ministers, and students for the ministry to meet in London on October 26 (the day after the autumnal meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), with the view of securing more effective co-operation in objects common to them all. A list of such trusts, funds, and societies has been prepared, which is probably not complete. The secretary of the Conference, therefore, will be much obliged for information about any which may have been overlooked.

The next meeting of the Conference committee was fixed for October 26.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION OF PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN CHURCHES.

SOCIAL QUESTIONS COMMITTEE.

Circular Letter to the Associated Churches.

ONE of the most urgent and important of the questions that the Christian Churches of our time have to face is that of their relationship to the society of which they form a part, and to the many problems which press for solution. The members of these Churches, if they wish the Gospel they profess to continue as a living power in the lives of the mass of men to-day, must show that they realise their responsibility to do what they can to remedy the unhappy conditions in which so large a proportion of the people of this land live. They should show that they are alive to the social needs of men, and to the demands of social duty which their Christianity implies.

Our Churches have always laid stress on religion as a matter that concerns very closely men's practical daily lives. It must reveal its purity in conduct and character. They have urged the need of personal righteousness, of the development of those characteristics that make for truth and integrity, and health in mind and soul. The members of our Churches, as individuals, have not been slow to answer the calls to help and save the community in which they live. We have not, however, yet realised to any great extent the responsibility that devolves upon us in our capacity, not only as individuals, but as members of Christian Churches, of Societies whose sacred task it is, not only to cultivate the highest life in their members, but also to express that life in the service of the wider world about them. One of the great articles of the Christian faith is summed up in the phrase—"The brotherhood of Man." As children of a common Father, we are brothers one of another. But this implies something more than a theoretic relationship. Brotherliness has its active duties and present sacrifices. It is realised only in practical work, and in the effort to make the brotherly spirit felt in forms that help and uplift our brother men.

The Christianity of the churches ought to touch life in every aspect, and there is no question affecting human welfare to which it can be indifferent. It must no longer be content to stand by, without offering help, when men are striving to liberate themselves from the social ills that oppress them. Our churches must realise the wider Gospel which means not only the effort after individual perfection, but the promotion of every good cause which aims at justice and righteousness, and also the abolition of those outward conditions which are hostile to the growth of healthy life. They cannot, if they would maintain and extend their influence, neglect the outward conditions of men's lives. They must do their share in the work of social reform. Such questions as those of the evils of drink, gambling, and impurity, the conditions of poverty and its relief, unemployment and defective housing can no longer be looked upon as problems which do not concern the churches. They are not only economic, but moral and spiritual questions. They vitally affect not only the outward life, but the soul as well. For the demoralising conditions under which a multitude of our poorer brethren have to live, often form an effective barrier against the spread of that Gospel of health of body and soul which the churches exist to teach. The Christian Churches have lost their hold over a large number of people just because they have not recognised their responsibilities in these matters. Is it not a mockery if we simply preach the Gospel of Love and do nothing to remove those evils that most of all stand in its way?

There is a danger of the advancing movement towards a better state of social conditions being too much a question of conflict between interests and rights, and resolving itself into a mere struggle for outward and material welfare. The influence of the Christian Churches is necessary to the permanent success of the remedial measures. It seems to your Committee that our churches have special responsibilities in this matter.

The Governing Body of our Association has approved of concerted action on the part of the churches of this district, and this Committee has been formed to endeavour to arouse a greater interest, and to assist such collective effort.

Earnest appeal is made to the various churches forming the Manchester District Association, not only to support the Social Questions Committee to the utmost of their ability, but also to take such action, in regard to these questions, as the individual churches may find practicable.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

Annual Meeting.

The fifty-fifth annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Monday evening, and was moderately attended, the President, Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, holding the usual pleasant reception before the business began.

The President, on taking the chair, called on the Secretary, Mr. G. H. Clennell, who announced a number of letters of regret for absence, including letters from the Right Hon. William Kenrick, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, President of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties; and Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P.; and then read the Committee's annual report.

The report emphasised the two very urgent claims, pointed out by Dr. Blake Odgers, the President at the last annual meeting, as resting upon London Unitarians, viz., for the erection of the buildings required to equip the three churches at Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead, and securing an adequate income for the Society. Towards the Three Churches Building Fund, for which £7,000 was asked, £3,000 had so far been promised, largely through the generosity of a few munificent donors, and appeal was made for more widespread support. The retirement of the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed from the post of District Missionary Minister, after two years' service, was recorded with great regret, and among the helpful things he had done, the founding of the Laymen's Club and the London Unitarian Choral Society, was specially noted. Mr. Wicksteed had retired on the ground that he did not feel able to undertake that degree of aggressive propagandist work which might naturally be looked for from the holder of such an office. The success of the recent People's Services in the Stratford Town Hall was recorded, and the urgent need of the Acton congregation for a settled minister. The future of Kentish Town, where the congregation was about to celebrate its jubilee by holding a bazaar, was under serious consideration, and there was prospect of the work there being reorganised on the lines of an Institutional church. At Kilburn, the Rev. J. E. Stronge had been minister for ten years, from the formation of the congregation, and had now removed to Kidderminster. With new church buildings it was hoped that the independence of the congregation would be secured. At Lewisham the congregation was prospering under the ministry of the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, and the Church Building Fund had been increased by £224 5s. from a recent bazaar, and a further £62 from a sale of work. At Plumstead the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones had again been elected Mayor of Woolwich, and the Church Building Fund had been increased by £105 from a bazaar. Mr. C. A. Ginever had retired from the charge of Stepney; the Rev. Gordon Cooper had succeeded the Rev. John Ellis at Mansford-street; the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, a new comer from the Methodist body, had taken charge of the work at Peckham, where the Rev. George Carter had retired after a devoted ministry of over thirty years in the South of London. The Rev. A. A. Charlesworth had succeeded the Rev. R. H. Greaves at Highgate, and as assistant minister at Essex Church Mr. Cooper had been succeeded by the Rev. F. Hankinson. The Rev. J. E. Stronge on his removal had to relinquish the office of joint secretary, and received the cordial thanks of the Committee. Mr. T. H. Terry, much to the committee's regret, was obliged by other claims to resign the treasurership. The concluding paragraphs of the report were as follows:—

"An examination of the financial statement shows a slight falling off of income from subscriptions as compared with last year. This is much to be regretted, as the regular income of the Society is insufficient to meet the claims of work already undertaken.

"The Committee are grateful for the practical sympathy shown in our work by the eleven London congregations who have given us collections during the year. This is a practice which we should be glad to see followed by all the Churches in the London District.

"We have again to thank the Trustees of the Permanent Chapel Building Fund for placing at our disposal the interest of so much of their fund as is not out on loan. This amounts to over £230, and is a most welcome addition to our limited resources. A legacy of £45 has also been received from the Executors of the late Mr. T. G. Foster.

"It is with great regret that we have to record the deaths of valued subscribers and friends. Mr. John Warren was for many years a subscriber. He was a member of your Committee from 1864 to 1870, and his name was associated with various of our Societies and Churches in all of which he took great interest. The late Mrs. Davies will be missed by a very wide circle to whom her genuine sympathy and generous charities had endeared her. Mr. J. Cogan Conway, who had been a subscriber to our Society since 1871; will always be gratefully remembered in our community for his services in connection with the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, which he was largely instrumental in founding in 1902.

"In commending the work of the Society to our subscribers and to the Unitarians of London, the Committee desire to express their cordial thanks for the generous support which has enabled such work as is here recorded to be carried on. We cannot but feel that the work is by no means adequate to the needs or to the possibilities which London presents for the earnest progagation of a reasonable and inspiring religious faith."

Mr. T. H. Terry presented the accounts, which, including a balance of £86 17s. 7d., showed receipts amounting to £1,313 19s. 10d. This included £390 from the sale of Consols, £237 8s. 2d. from the income of the Permanent Chapel Building Fund, and £246 5s. in grants from the B. & F. U. A. Annual subscriptions amounted to £215 6s. 6d, and chapel collections (eleven) £45 1s. The payments included £227 7s. 6d. for the purchase of the Acton site and expenses, and £672 6s. 8d. in grants of various amounts to nine congregations, ranging from £2 1s. 8d. for Kilburn to £175 for Kentish Town. There remained a balance of £78 12s. 7d. in hand. As to the Three Churches Building Fund, the treasurer said that he now had promises amounting to £3,100, and £2,100 had been paid and was on deposit at the bank. The Society bore the expenses of the Fund, so that every penny given went to the building of the churches. On account of the Lewisham Building Fund, £1,000 had been paid towards the purchase of the site.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that while the report on the whole was satisfactory, he must repeat what he had said before, that the subscription list of a little over £200 for that work was a disgrace to London Unitarians, and he hoped that it would be doubled during the year. Some of the committee had doubled their subscriptions, and he hoped the example would be followed. As to the Three Churches Building Fund they must go on, and must get at least another £2,000, though where it was to come from he did not yet know; but it was most important that the church at Kilburn should be got immediately, and the same was true of Lewisham and Plumstead. He spoke with great satisfaction of the popular services at the Stratford Town Hall, which he hoped would be repeated, and then proceeded to note other points of special interest in the report, the retirement of Mr. Wicksteed, and the good work he had done, the prospect at Kentish Town, the well-earned rest which Mr. Carter had claimed. Considering the recent mission in the West of London, he thought their work was not yet done. He had been struck by the immense amount of advertising of that mission, and thought they might learn something from it. Some steps should be taken to make their work better known. There was a great work to be done in giving definite Christian teaching, and he hoped they would help it on. Possibly they ought to move some of their centres of operation to places where there was more life and their work was more wanted. In conclusion, he expressed their regret at Mr. Terry's retirement from the treasurership, and their special indebtedness to Mr. Howard Young, their chairman of committee, and Mr. Clennell, the secretary.

The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards seconded

the motion, and said that they ought very gravely to consider the measure of support given to that society; it did not seem to him that there should be much said as to generosity in that connection. He paid a tribute to the earnest work that had been done at Stratford, and laid stress on the need of a minister for Acton.

The report and accounts having been adopted, the officers were elected, on the motion of Dr. Herbert Smith, seconded by Mr. A. Wilson, Mr. Hahnemann Epps being elected President, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke and Dr. Blythe, treasurers; and Mr. G. H. Clennell and the Rev. E. S. Hicks, secretaries. On the motion of Mr. Titford, seconded by the Rev. S. H. Street, the committee was elected, with Mr. Howard Young as chairman, and the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth as a new member.

Mr. G. CALLOW then proposed and Mr. I. S. LISTER seconded a special vote of thanks to Mr. G. H. Clennell for his services as Secretary, which was very cordially passed.

ADDRESS BY THE MAYOR OF WOOLWICH.

The Rev. L. JENKINS JONES, of Plumstead, who is for the second time Mayor of Woolwich, then gave an address on the claims of weaker churches to the consideration of the strong, and on aspects of social and religious life as he had found them in his own municipal experience. There was a strong desire, he said, that he should present to them the claims of the weaker churches, and especially the three churches at Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead, which were in such urgent need of new buildings, and enlist the sympathy of the wealthier churches on their behalf. Those three churches all held the promise of ultimate self-support; and because that was for the good of their common life he urged the claim. There was a great distance, both geographically and socially, between the churches of Kensington and Hampstead on the one hand, and of Lewisham and Woolwich on the other, and so it was necessary to bring the claims of the weaker congregations before them in a very definite manner. If they had a mission, and he hoped and believed they all felt that was so, and were to succeed in their work, it would be, not because they had a few strong churches, but because the stronger had thrown themselves into line with the weaker, and came generously and willingly to their defence. An overfed plant, they were told, bore nothing but leaves and no flowers. So it might be with an overfed and prosperous church. If it were not identified with the weaker, and those needing the greater sympathy, it would not produce the needful vitality even for its own purposes. No one single church could fully voice Unitarianism and its mission. It might be a very capable and wealthy congregation, with a very capable minister, but it could not voice the mission of Unitarianism for the whole community. There was need of the different aspects of all the churches, rich and poor, strong and weak. Whatever they preferred to call their churches, if they stood for the beautiful and noble mission which was at their heart, they must unite to give expression to the whole voice, and conviction, and beauty of Unitarian thought. They who belonged to the wealthier churches could not stand outside and erect a wall round themselves; the stronger churches would not last unless they united with the rest for a common work. Their strength was not in the wealthiest church, but in the weakest; the weakest link was the measure of their strength. Many people stood aloof, nursing their own peculiarities, nursing fads to the detriment of the thing for which they stood, freedom in their religious efforts, freedom to worship God. It was for their own sake that he urged upon the strong that they must help the weak.

Turning next to his outlook upon life in a wider sense, the Mayor of Woolwich spoke forcibly and with humour of the importance of his borough, and of the approach which the Bishop had recently made to him in the matter of a new bishopric. There were three things he had specially to note. During the past year and a half he had had many opportunities of observing the social life of the community. He had attended many functions, and not merely dinners. At the dinners he had noted that they differed very much according to the company he kept, and that the kind of music provided also differed very much; but that at all, rich and poor alike, there was a great deal of drinking. The drink might differ, at the dinner of a rich corporation and the dinner of a friendly society; but on both sides there was a magnificent opportunity for preaching temperance, and to bring back men and women to a simple life. He had suffered plenty of ridicule because he would not drink; but so long as his voice was heard in pulpit or on platform he would speak of what he had seen and heard, to the aristocrat on the one side, and to the common labourer on the other, and should plead for simple pleasures and simple living. As to the religious life of the working people, it was something he could not define. The working man was not theological. He did not care a bit about their church or chapel. He was as a rule anti-church. The social workers had got tired of the Christian Church, because the Christian Church had not voiced their aspirations, and had not always sided with the weak, but had allowed them to go to the wall. Whether they as Unitarians had been too intellectual rather than caring for the duties of everyday life, he did not know. He did not think they were more intellectual than others. But they had not gone straight to the heart of life, and had not preached their gospel as the highest. The working man was drifting, consciously or unconsciously, to Socialism. He did not understand it—though some of them, like Keir Hardie, might; and there was division among themselves. They did not understand one another. The fact ought to be noted that the large majority of social workers were outside the Church. They were more alive to the Social movement than to religion. They as Unitarians had a mission in the matter of religion, and it was not to minimise differences, and make it appear that they were as much like the orthodox as possible, but to make the difference quite clear, for it was the natural order of evolution that they must overcome and take the place of orthodoxy. Mr. Jones then gave his experience as Unitarian minister and Mayor of his borough; how he had been asked to various functions by various bodies once, and the trouble that had followed in several orthodox bodies; and how more than once, when he had been invited to take part in meetings, his friends had been obliged, with shame, to withdraw their invitations, because of the hot opposition from the ultra-orthodox side. The moral he drew was that they must stand firmly on their own ground, shoulder to shoulder, for a common principle and a common purpose, with a common voice and then some real good would be accomplished.

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Jones for his address, and in doing so emphasised the plea for united work.

Mr. ALFRED CLARKE seconded, and the vote was cordially passed.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. Howard Young, and seconded by Mr. H. Epps, brought the meeting to a close.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MARTINEAU MEMORIAL FUND, NORWICH.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to draw attention to the list of subscriptions to the above published in another column of your present issue. Your readers will, I am sure, be interested to know that the property constituting the site for the memorial came into the possession of the Octagon congregation on Wednesday in Easter week, a sufficient sum for the purchase money (£2,000) and legal expenses (£54 1s. 8d.) having been subscribed some time previous to the appeal for the buildings commenced in April of this year. It should be stated that the legal expenses on the side of the purchasers were very kindly given by Messrs. Ladell & Son, solicitors, members of the congregation. The collections during the centenary meetings amounted to rather more than £30, and the profits from Mr. Wicksteed's lecture to £7 15s. Altogether, including balance of promises from members of the Octagon congregation, &c., we have now about £1,080 towards the £4,000 required for buildings, &c. It will be seen from this that we are still a very long way at present from the attainment of the object in view. It seems superfluous to add to the appeal which the recent meetings surely constituted in themselves; but perhaps I may be allowed to quote the words of a lady recently staying in Norwich:—"I am sure anyone who has seen the swarms of young folk of both sexes who go about Norwich after shop hours should welcome and promote any place where they can be collected and improved!" This side of our work is only one of several which the Memorial buildings will help us to carry on.—I am, yours faithfully,

F. A. MOTTRAM.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—Anniversary services were held at the Old Meeting on Sunday and Monday last. There were four services altogether, and the Revs. Lewis Williams, Rhydygwin, and J. Hathren Davies gave each three discourses. Many friends from a distance were present.

Accrington.—Preaching from Jer. v. 5 on Easter Sunday morning, the Rev. W. H. Burgess referred to the Martineau centenary, and said that in all simplicity Martineau might be called one of those "great men" who "have known the way of the Lord and the judgment of their God," and fortunately we could still share in the companionship of his thoughts through the works he had left behind. Mr. Burgess read extracts from two unpublished autograph letters of Martineau to illustrate his felicity of expression, his tender and delicate sympathy with those in sorrow, and his earnest desire to combat all shallow and carping criticism of God's working in the natural world. On the following Sunday morning Mr. Burgess dealt with the pronouncement of the Bishop of Norwich on the Athanasian Creed. He pointed out that, if the Bishop were right in saying that the mass of the people got their knowledge of the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation almost entirely from the Athanasian Creed, then he was virtually substantiating the old Unitarian contention that those doctrines, as popularly understood, were unscriptural. On Sunday last, May 7, the annual school sermons were preached by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury. In the afternoon, a musical service was given by an augmented choir of 40 voices. The collections for the day amounted to over £13. Mr. Burgess completes his ministry, here at the end of June, and the pulpit will then be vacant.

Blackpool: South Shore.—A debt of £339, incurred in the erection of the new building, has been paid off by Mr. J. R. G. Grundy and Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy.

Bury Sunday School Union.—The annual tea and meeting of this Union was held at Ainsworth on Saturday, May 6. There was a good attendance from most of the schools of the Union. The annual report was submitted and adopted, also the treasurer's statement of accounts, with a balance on the right side. Mr. William Yates, of Ainsworth, is the new president. The summer rambles have been well attended, as well as the lantern lectures given by the Revs. W. H. Burgess and T. P. Spedding. Taken altogether the year has been a fairly successful one. At the close of the business meeting a social and dance concluded the proceedings.

Hull.—Another of the meetings to promote the success of the Home Missionary College Jubilee Scheme was held in the Park-street School, on Friday, May 5. Mr. S. Harris, of Hornsea, presided, and addresses were delivered by Principal Gordon and Rev. T. P. Spedding. Questions were asked and answered most satisfactorily, and the meeting expressed its sympathy with the project for providing a hall of residence, in a practical manner. A few subscriptions were promised, and Mr. W. B. Holmes volunteered to act as local treasurer, and to communicate with all the members of the congregation.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The last of the week-evening meetings for the season has just been held by the recently formed Young Helpers' Guild. Established in January, weekly meetings of the members, under the direction of the minister, have been held for training and preparation for the monthly meetings. Three of the latter have been held, attended by an average of 140, and music, recitations, dialogues, and addresses by the Rev. W. R. Shanks and Mr. M. Rowe have given profit and pleasure to the "helpers" and their friends. Another successful effort inaugurated during the past season has been a series of monthly "At Homes."

London: Bermondsey.—The flower service and Sunday-school anniversary were held on May 7. Friends from far and near had contributed copious floral offerings in great variety; including quantities of primroses, cowslips, and bluebells, besides many sweet-scented flowers of garden growth, which filled the church with a delicious fragrance. In the afternoon Mr. George Callow addressed the school. At the evening service a lady of the Brixton congregation sang: "Consider the Lilies," and sixty of the scholars sang a special hymn, each of whom at the end of the service was presented with a nosegay, whilst many of them carried extra bunches to the bedsides of sick neighbours

London: Islington.—On Sunday last, spring flower services were held at Unity Church, which was beautifully decorated with floral emblems The morning service was mainly for children, when the school choir sang an anthem very effectively. The Rev. E. Savill Hicks gave an impressive address on "Consider the lilies, how they grow." In the evening a special musical service was held, under the direction of the organist, Mr. John Brittan, and attracted a large congregation. Distin's anthem, "The Lord is King," and the cantata by Gade, "Spring's Message," were rendered by an augmented choir. The beautiful setting, by Liddle, of "Abide with me" was also rendered as a solo. Mr. Hicks' sermon was an eloquent appeal for more religious worship, and closer communion with nature and God, as a rest, amidst the rush and turmoil of present-day life.

Manchester: Oldham Road.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last, and excellent discourses were given—in the morning by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, of Oldham, and in the evening by the Rev. S. A. Stenthal. The children sang special hymns morning and evening, and in the afternoon gave a service of song, entitled "Mollie's Roses," Mr. Burton giving the connective readings. The services were bright and helpful.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The anniversary services at the Church of the Divine Unity were conducted last Sunday by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, and the evening sermon was well reported next day in the Chronicle. On Monday evening the annual meeting was held in the church, when the Rev. Frank Walters presided, and there was a good attendance. Before the business came on a presentation was made to Alderman J. Barker Ellis of a silver rose bowl and a pair of silver flower epergnes, to mark his fifty years of service in the church. Mr. Robert Affleck made the presentation on behalf of the congregation and choir, with which Mr. Ellis had been connected nearly the whole fifty years, and Mr. George Laidler and the chairman also joined in the expressions of warm regard for Mr. Barker Ellis, who made a feeling response. The Rev. L. Johnston, minister of a North Shields Congregational Church, expressed his sympathy with Unitarianism, and said it would be better for both Congregationalists and Unitarians if they had closer relations. He did not believe that Unitarianism would ever reach the heart of England, and he believed it would be good for Unitarianism if it could get hitched on to Congregationalism. It had long been a dream with him that the basis of church relation should be changed from one of opinion to one of affection. A church was a society for the promotion of goodness. He believed the Unitarian ideal followed along these lines. Mr. G. G. Armstrong, of Darlington, who was the next speaker said that the smallness of their numbers did not prove their mission unsuccessful. Men reared in their churches were taking their full share in local, national, and imperial affairs; their work for liberal theology and for freedom was being done. The greatest principle of their church was justification by works rather than by faith. The Mayor of Newcastle (Alderman J. Baxter Ellis) bore testimony to the broadening of theological thought, and to the growing union for good work. He moved a cordial vote of thanks to Miss von Petzold for her sermons, which in her absence, Mrs. John Tweedy, who has also occupied the pulpit of the church, on her behalf acknowledged.

Preston.—This congregation is about to build a new Sunday-school, class-rooms, and vestry, at a cost of some £600. For the purpose of raising part of the money required a bazaar was held last week; opened on the first day by Mr. Wm. Long, J.P.; on the second by Mr. D. Healey; and on the third day by Miss Kate Ryley. In every respect the effort was an unqualified success, and a sum of £402 was the result.

Stannington (Resignation).—Owing to advanced age and failing health, the Rev. Iden Payne has sent in his resignation as minister (which was very regretfully accepted) to take effect on July 31 next. Mr. Payne will then have been sixty-three years in the Unitarian ministry without a break, the last twenty and half years being spent at Stannington.

Stockton-on-Tees (Presentation).—At the last social evening of the season on Thursday, April 27, a presentation consisting of four volumes of the "Encyclopædia Biblica"—an "Introduction to the New Testament," and "Varieties of Religious Experience," was made to the Rev. H. Cross, who has accepted an appointment as assistant missionary to the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. Mr. Chas. Bowes, in making the presentation, spoke with satisfaction of the important ministerial appointment Mr. Cross had received, but regretted they were parting with an old friend and faithful servant, who, during his three and a half years as minister at Stockton, had found a warm place in the hearts of his congregation. Mr. Cross had thrown himself heart and soul into every institution of the church's life, the Sunday-school, Band of Hope, and Young People's Guild, and his valuable help would be greatly missed. Mr. W. J. Watson, Alderman Green, and Mr. T. F. Ward, of Middlesbrough, also spoke in terms of appreciation of Mr. Cross's work. Mr. Cross, feelingly acknowledging the presentation, referred to the friendships he had formed at Stockton, and said he would always remember the great kindness and consideration he had received at their hands.

Torquay.—The recent sale of work at Unity Hall was opened on the first day by Mrs. J. Sowerdon, the Mayoress, who was accompanied by the Mayor, and on the second day by Mrs. Jolliffe. The Rev. A. E. O'Connor presided. The sale was for the benefit of the church funds, and the proceeds, together with donations, after paying all expenses, amounted to £50.

Walthamstow.—On Thursday evening, May 4, a social gathering of the members and friends of the congregation was held to bid farewell to Mrs. Salt who will shortly be leaving for Canada to join her husband. During the evening a presentation consisting of a handsome clock was made to Mr. and Mrs. Salt by the Rev. W. H. Rose, on behalf of many friends, as a token of esteem and gratitude. Mr. Rose acknowledged the valuable services which Mr. and Mrs. Salt have rendered for the church. For some time Mr. Salt acted as treasurer and afterwards as secretary of the church. Mrs. Salt has been an ardent worker both for the church and Sunday-school, having been an active member of the Church Aid Society from its inauguration a few years ago, and a teacher in the Sunday-school. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards spoke of the work which Mr. and Mrs. Salt and family did for the church before Mr. Rose became the minister. Councillor Krailing paid a warm tribute to Mrs. Salt's work in connection with various social and political organisations in the town.

We are glad to call the attention of our readers to an exhibition of pictures by Mr. Horace Mann Livens, during the present month, at the Rowley Gallery in Silver-street, Kensington, not five minutes' walk from the Notting-hill-gate Station. Mr. Livens, who is a brother of the Rev. H. M. Livens, is a very skilful impressionist painter, and his studies of fowls, which form a great part of the exhibition (there are nearly 150 pictures in all) are wonderfully vivid and life like. Two years Mr. Livens devoted recently almost exclusively to the poultry yard and its neighbouring country; ducks secured a share of his attention, but they have not the vivid colours of the fowls. Yet all that he paints is alive.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove's Easter Sunday sermon is printed in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit, with the title "When it was Dark," and speaking of the Resurrection and the true grounds of faith, it refers at length to the preposterous fiction with that title, which the Bishop of London so widely advertised by his enlightened commendation. Would that everyone who has read the novel might also ponder the sermon.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE first two numbers of a new series of "Sermons by Unitarian Ministers" are issued this week by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The first sermon is by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong on "The Unseen Things of Life"; the second, by the Rev. C. J. Street, on "The Besetting God." There are twelve sermons already announced in this series, sold at a penny each. Among them we note one by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer on "Christ in Hades."

THE publication of Dr. Warschauer's sermon in this series "by Unitarian ministers," with his unqualified consent, after he has accepted a call to the ministry of the Anerley Congregational Church, in conjunction with his friend, who has been from the first in the Congregational Ministry, may be commended to the consideration of sectarian critics. Dr. Warschauer is as much a Unitarian now as he has ever been, and he has publicly stated that the transfer of his services from one communion to another signifies no theological change whatever. He has been a minister in one truly Free Church. He now goes to another. The members of the Anerley Congregational Church are no doubt perfectly aware of what they have done. As a matter of business, we suppose, Dr. Warschauer's name will be transferred from the roll of ministers in the Essex Hall Year Book to that of the Congregational Year Book, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will perhaps lose a modest subscriber to its funds.

"A HOLY Church the Moral Guide of Society" was the title, as we noted last week, of the address given by Dr. P. T. Forsyth as chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. The address was divided into two parts, the first dealing with the inward side of religion, the central power of inspiration, which there must be in a living church; the second part with practical questions of present-day moral and social problems, and what the church ought to be doing in those matters.

THE power of the Cross, at the heart of the moral principle of holiness in the Church, in conflict with the egotism of the world, was the central thought of the first part of this eloquent and searching address. Dr. Forsyth spoke to his brethren with the utmost fearlessness. "We are a great body of Free Churchmen," he said, "and I have long been impressed with the fact that the Free Churches have been gaining more in public attention than in public weight. They are forces more than guides. Their bulk tends to outgrow their influence. That is easy if they relax their gospel, if they feminise it, or if they apply it but to the cry of the hour, and become a branch of journalism, or the prey of the press. I cannot avoid certain misgivings. Do they realise the moral situation on a large scale?" And then he went on to develop his thought of that consecration which must be in the inward life of the church, and the power of holiness by which alone they could conquer and do their true work in the world. For the Institutional Church he had this word of warning: "To say that the Church, as distinct from its missions, is primarily a working society is to secularise it. In some, in many, cases the agencies have become of more interest than the Communion. The work may represent an itch of activity rather than an inspiration of service. It is English restlessness rather than Christian energy, and it burns itself out." Of the doctrine of the address there is more to be said. Here we simply commend it to the attention of religious thinkers.

THE second part of Dr. Forsyth's address is to be specially commended to Liberal politicians. "It is the leaders of finance," he said, "that have the decisive influence in the actual politics of the West. Capital is the true International, and gold the true Yellow Peril. What is the relation between this world-power of capital and the holy ethic of a world-gospel like Christianity?" Let Dr. Forsyth's answer be considered (the Address may be had for 3d. from the Congregational Union, Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, E.C.), and with it the speech made by Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence at the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission, reported in our present issue.

As a hint of what Dr. Forsyth's answer is, we give the following passage:—"The "land question is only slumbering and "gaining strength. And mindless wealth "is producing Socialist sympathies where "there is no belief in Socialist schemes. "But these are only harbingers of some-"thing much more searching and radical, "to which the ethic of a Christian brother-"hood moves. There is no need for alarm. "The change must come by the ethical "conversion of Society, and by no "catastrophe. We must move by "economic methods and on constitu-"tional lines, with a moral base. And "the Church must do more to inspire "and guide that movement than she has "done."

THE Assembly passed from the address of its Chairman to the consideration of a number of public questions of the first importance. The education difficulty, of course; the matter of licensing, too, arouses no surprise; and the ethics of journalism is no departure from what may be expected of a meeting of members of a religious body. But the first of the resolutions, which was moved by Mr. Percy Alden, does strike us as significant. The resolution dealt with unemployment, and ran as follows:—

"The Assembly hereby expresses its "profound sympathy with the large "number of persons who have recently "suffered severe distress and hardship "through unemployment. It believes "that there exists a large number of "men and women who, even in times "of normal prosperity, are, through "no fault of their own, unable to obtain "remunerative labour, and that the "problem is grave and urgent. The "Assembly expresses its satisfaction "that the present distress has so "powerfully stimulated sympathetic "action in many quarters, official and "otherwise, and believes that the time "has arrived when labour should be "made a department of State in the "hands of a responsible Minister."

THIS resolution was passed unanimously. The meeting was not deterred by the explanation given by the seconder that it is "Collectivist in tone and means Collectivism." Mr Alden, too, treated the resolution as one illustration of the principle laid down by the Chairman, and pressed home the argument that labour problems were insoluble under the present system of competition. The speeches perhaps go beyond the strict terms of the resolution, but it is interesting to find that the speakers were able to carry the meeting with them. The Assembly is in sympathy with a Collectivist programme. It is not possible to say more than that, and the problem is not solved by sympathy, but only by action. Yet we have to recognise here a temper far removed from that day some years ago when a meeting of Congregationalist ministers and laymen, after inviting Mr. Keir Hardie to address them refused him a hearing. The country is beginning to realise at least a national responsibility for unemployment, and the Union resolution reflects this consciousness.

A RESOLUTION on education was moved by that veteran of Liberationists Mr. Carvell Williams and supported by Dr. Guiness Rogers. The resolution is far too long to quote in full, and it is unnecessary to say that it condemns the recent education Acts. At the same time the definition of the end of education as preparation for the "duties of British citizens" is worthy of note. Would that this supreme need had been kept more clear by the conflicting parties. The resolution was not adopted until after an amendment had been accepted. This seems to mark an important advance in thought. The deleted clause runs: "The school curriculum should be so framed as not to permit of sectarian instruction or in any way violate religious equality." The words substituted are: "No teaching in religion should be given at the expense of the education authority, and the school curriculum should be so framed as not in any way to violate religious equality."

WE do not venture to interpret this alteration, since the apparently still more explicit language of Dr. Horton, which was given in our notes last week, has since been explained by its author not to mean what it seemed to most people to convey. Dr. Horton's explanation amounts to this (if we understand it), that his utterance is to be read in connection with a clause of some resolution passed some time or other at Newcastle; and, that being so, we are only to take Dr. Horton as approving the "simple Bible teaching," which Churchmen and Secularists hate. We venture to think this is not a "clear logical issue."

THE third resolution, on licensing, which protests against the endowment of the brewing interests was carried; but already the time was far spent, and no speech was made in its favour, certainly none was needed. And so the Assembly separated. It had spent several hours in the treatment of some of the most serious matters which can affect our national life. The gathering is a large one. Its enthusiasm is great. Whether it grasped all the political and ethical principles involved may be doubtful. Yet there is something stimulating in the spectacle of a great religious assembly thus recognising a public duty. In essence the underlying meaning of these meetings is to be found in the conviction: We ought, as an integral part of our mission, to be in a position to afford guidance to the nation in the task of organising the whole national life.

WRITING on the Schiller Centenary in the Manchester Guardian of May 9, Professor C. H. Herford said that in his judgment Schiller's creative power was not of the highest, and that his ideality often beguiled him into the abstract and the vague. Wordsworth's complaint that Goethe was not "inevitable enough" might with even greater truth be made of Schiller:—

"His poetry is poor in the elemental "directness and simplicity, in the 'bare, "sheer penetrating power' in which our "finest Nature poetry is so great. But, "on the other hand, it renders with "unsurpassed brilliance and intensity the "ideals of culture—the ideals not of "cultured men merely, but of men for "whom culture is life. It is a poetry of "ideas, but of ideas vitally in touch with "conduct and character, with passion "and joy and will. If beauty is the last "word of Schiller's poetry, it is beauty "as apprehended neither by the epicurean "nor by the puritan, but by the strenuous "artist whose chisel extracts it from the "marble block. He taught a world "inclined to be either ascetic or effeminate "to feel at once and to feel equally the "moral grandeur of heroism and the deep "power of joy; and beside him in the "German pantheon stand not only his "master, Kant, and his comrade, Goethe, "but the yet mightier genius who created "the 'Eroica' and built upon Schiller's "'Hymn of Joy' the climax of the Ninth "Symphony."

MARTINEAU CENTENARY AT BUDAPEST.—The Francis David Society is a branch of the social work of the Unitarian congregation in Budapest. The last conference in this season of the Society, on May 6, was dedicated to the memory of Dr. Martineau, whose service to the Christian Church at large had been appreciated by a number of Hungarian students. Mr. Jozan, of Budapest, read an essay on the life and letters of the great Unitarian divine, giving in conclusion a clear statement of his theological and ethical system. A crowded and select audience listened with rapt attention to Bishop Ferencz's allocution, who admired in Dr. Martineau both the enthusiastic teacher and the sound philosopher. Personal recollections of his visit to Manchester College in the fifties gave a peculiar charm to his touching address. Bishop Ferencz, in turn, was also loyally congratulated, on behalf of church and society, on his fifty years spent in the active service of the College and the Unitarian ministry. Several musical items, the English and Hungarian national hymns, and a Bach air on cello by Mr. C. D. Jones, of England, among the rest, made this farewell meeting a source of inspiration and a beacon-light of Christian brotherhood for the future.

PRESENT-DAY CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Two statements by English Unitarian ministers, and one by a minister of the Remonstrant Church in Holland, are here printed. The first was, we understand, originally drawn up by the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, and has recently been printed by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, in the Calendar of the Ullet-road Church, Liverpool:—

"We are often asked to give a short summary of our free faith, that those who attend our services may know where we stand in the wide field of Christendom. We have no authorised creed in the sense of a formula which all are required to accept. We exact no confession of faith from any of our members. Nevertheless the following is a brief statement of Religious Principles as generally held by Unitarian Christians:—

"We believe in One Supreme God, the Father, whose nature is love; and in His Holy Spirit or Divine influence which He bestows on His children.

"We maintain that God is infinitely wise and good—that true happiness results from obedience to His laws; and that, while virtue brings its due reward and sin its proper punishment, in this life or in the life to come, God will finally bring every soul into a state of holiness and bliss.

"We accept Jesus Christ as the highest example and the greatest religious teacher of men; and are guided by his precepts, and seek to bring our thoughts and actions into harmony with his mind and life.

"We hold that true religion consists (as Jesus taught) in the love of God and man, and in keeping God's commandments, and that obedience should be cheerfully rendered, and worship freely offered to God from love and not from fear.

"We use the Bible as the chief source of religious knowledge and truth, but maintain the right and duty of free inquiry, and that every man is responsible for his faith to God alone.

"We therefore neither require nor expect entire uniformity of belief in our fellow-worshippers, but only the unity which comes from a kindred spirit and purpose, and from a common desire for advancement in the Christian course.

"And we accordingly invite to social worship and intercourse all who are true to their reason and conscience, and who regard the attendance on religious observances as a reasonable service to God, and as tending to elevate the life and character of man."

The Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., of Unity Church, Bolton, recently printed the following confession in his Church Calendar:—

"I believe in God and in God's universe, and in God's method of governing it. I believe that God is so human as to love the companionship of men, and that men are so divine as to learn their noblest lessons from Him. I believe that God so desired men that He created them, so loves them as to sustain them in His presence, and will always hereafter so love them as in the course of eternity to complete that education, salvation, and perfection of humanity which He undertook in the creation of man. I have faith in God, and in His power to do this. With God all things are possible, even the forgiveness of sins. I have faith in the infinite forces at His disposal, in His resources as a Teacher, in His powers as a Disciplinarian, and in His love as a Father, and I do not wish to be saved from Him, to escape His salutary discipline, to be blind to His judgments, to shun His mercies, or to doubt His love."

This third personal confession formed the conclusion of a sermon preached last year by Dr. H. L. Oort, Remonstrant minister at Utrecht, and a son of Professor Oort, of Leiden, in which he had strongly maintained the open principle for religious fellowship, and pointed out the mischief wrought by insistance on a dogmatic standard in the Church. Yet each one, he concluded, must have a living faith, and so in the following terms he declares his own :—

"I believe in the eternal and holy Source of all things. As the self-conscious spiritual life of man is the highest form of life of which we here have knowledge, so is this eternal Source of all self-conscious, spirit, superhuman. He is my God and Father, to whom I stand in personal relations.

"I believe in the immortal significance of every human soul. It has part in the Divine life, and of this, after earthly death, it shall become more completely conscious. Love and trust and feeling for truth shall grow ever clearer and stronger until they are perfected. I hope that there will be remembrance and re-union; where and how that shall be I do not know.

"I acknowledge moral evil in man as guilt, and believe that every sin meets with retribution, even on earth; but I believe also that by virtue of His own nature God will in time right all wrong, even as it is pictured in 'the Prodigal Son': the love of the Father, which lived in the son, who went away and sinned, draws him back to his Father's house and reconciles him with his Father.

"I am confident that all honesty and love work together for good, both for myself, and for the community, secretly but surely, by hidden, eternal laws, which constitute the moral order. I see this in the progress of mankind, in spite of all the sorrow and sin of our most imperfect society.

"I have found that pain and adversity bring people to a sincere disinterested love of God and man, a love which, taking the place of lost happiness and possessions, brings them comfort that truly satisfies.

"I think that these truths may be truly called glad tidings; and I honour Jesus Christ as the man in whom the strength of such faith and life was realised as purely as it is possible for us to conceive. What he sowed, comes up in the world, in ways we do not understand.

"The Kingdom of God comes in its own time, but surely it comes!"

THE stricter the obedience of the disciplined will, the more eagerly do we press forward to the mark of a higher calling.—H. W. Crosskey.

LITERATURE.

A STUDY OF ROMAN SOCIETY UNDER THE EMPIRE.*

SECOND NOTICE.

WE have spoken already in a previous article of the literary charm and the manifold interest of Professor Dill's study of Roman Society; but this interest culminates in his description of its moral and spiritual life, its forms of worship, and its dim gropings amid the mysteries of the Unseen. It is to this topic that we must now turn our attention. The period under review was not marked by philosophical breadth of view or speculative insight. Philosophy had become severely practical in its aim. Virtue was its end; and the philosopher had abdicated for the most part his functions as a thinker for the more popular rôle of a physician of souls. The wandering missionary plied his trade everywhere, sometimes with genuine zeal for his message, often lost in the mazes of empty rhetoric and self-adulation. The cold rationalism of a former generation had produced its inevitable reaction in a fresh appetite for marvel and a revival of the mystical side of religion. Everywhere there were signs of an awakening sense of personal religious need, a desire for peace of heart, for moral cleansing, for a sure and certain hope of immortality. "Men craved," says Professor Dill, "no longer for a God to explain the universe, but to resolve the enigma of their own lives; not a blind force, moving on majestically and mercilessly to 'some far-off divine event,' but an Infinite Father guiding in wisdom, cherishing in mercy, and finally receiving his children to Himself."

This religious revival is the most striking feature of the age of the Antonines, and of the generation that preceded it. It took a twofold shape. There was first of all an amazing growth of superstition of the most fantastic kind. There was in the second place the eager welcome given to Oriental forms of religion with their mystical rites, to Cybele, to Isis, and above all to Mithra. The long chapter on Superstition is an interesting study in human credulity, and it is also a pathetic illustration of the way in which the religious instinct avenges itself when it has been neglected or suppressed. There was a genuine return to belief in omens. Decayed shrines were restored, and were visited by crowds of pilgrims. Half-forgotten oracles sprang into sudden popularity. The belief in miracle became almost universal, and only a few cynical writers were left to mock at the popular credulity. Faith-healing was practised with all the resources of art and ingenuity, and the rich invalid, the victim of nerves and luxurious city life, wandered from one fashionable health-resort to another in the search for a cure, eager to be gulled by every new form of quackery. The following passage, an admirable piece of descriptive writing, illustrates the strange mingling of rational method and artful imposture :—

"From whatever cause, the worship of Asclepius had attained an extraordinary popularity in the age of the Antonines. The conditions of health and disease are so obscure, the influences of will and imagination on our bodily states are so marked, that, in all ages, the boundaries between the natural and the unknowable are blurred and may be easily crossed. The science of medicine, even down to the age of Hippocrates, or the age of Galen, had not abandoned all faith in the magical and mysterious. Incantations long held their ground beside more scientific remedies. Health being the most precious and the most precarious of earthly blessings, it is not strange that, in an age of revived belief in the supernatural, the god of health should attain a rank even on a level with the great Olympian gods. His temples rose in every land where Greek or Roman culture prevailed. They were generally built with an eye to beauty of scenery, or the virtues of some clear, cold, ancient spring, or other health-giving powers in the site, which might re-inforce the more mysterious influences of religion. And in every temple there was a hierarchy of sacred servants, who guarded a tradition of hieratic ceremonial and of medical science. There was the chief priest, who may or may not have been a trained physician. There were the daduchi and pyrophori, who attended to the punctual service of the altars. There were the neocori, who were probably physicians, and who waited on the patients, interpreting their visions, and often supplementing them by other visions of their own. There were also, in a lower rank, nurses, male and female, who, if we may judge from Aristides, performed the sympathetic part of our own hospital nurses. The patients came from all parts of the Græco-Roman world. After certain offerings and rites, the sufferer took his place in the long dormitory, which often contained beds for 200 or 300, with windows open all night long to the winds of the south. The sick man brought his bed-coverings, and made his gift to the altar. The lamps were lighted in the long gallery, a priest recited the vesper prayers. At a later hour, the lights were extinguished, strict silence was enjoined, and a hope for some soothing vision from above was left as a parting gift or salutation by the minister as he retired."

But there was another craving, as insistent as the desire for supernatural aid in weakness or the appetite for marvel. It is expressed in the lines, which always strike us as among the most poignant in the whole range of Latin poetry :—

Stabant orantes primi transmittere cursum,
Tendebantque manus ripae ulterioris amore.

The old Roman religion, with its ritual of the dead, was quite insufficient to meet and satisfy this longing for immortality. The calm arguments of philosophy, which spoke of the human soul as a divine spark, or as sharing in the nature of the Deity, had no meaning for the unreflective crowd. The truth must be embodied in symbols, it must touch the soul through the emotional power of mystical rites, and this was precisely the service which Oriental religion rendered to the ordinary citizen of the Empire. Our knowledge of the cult of Mithra is, as Professor Dill points out, one of the triumphs of modern archæology. We have been familiar for a long time with the influence of the worship of the Magna Mater and of Isis; but now Mithraism in its popular appeal, the extent of its influence and the startling rapidity of its growth seem to leave them quite in the shade. For a long period it was the most formidable rival of Christianity. It was apparently in the first century of our era that it left the bleak uplands of Asia Minor, where it had long been naturalised, and became a missionary religion in the Empire. It made its way to the sea-port towns and along the great rivers, the Danube, the Rhone, the Rhine. It found a home in Pannonia and Dacia, and the passes of the Alps, and remains of its rude popular art have been found even close to the Scottish border, in the neighbourhood of Hadrian's Wall. It was spread, in all probability, by the army. Soldiers were its missionaries, and the common people its chief votaries. The Mithræum was usually a small building, half underground, in order to maintain the primitive symbolism of a cave, and it is not unlikely that in the meetings for worship there was a social feeling, similar to that which exists at the present time in many small dissenting places of worship, which supplied elements of colour and warmth absent from the more stately temple. Of the worship itself it is more difficult to speak. We have to rely largely upon inference and conjecture even for its most characteristic ideas. Persian in origin, it was connected with Iranian sun-worship, but its most popular symbol, that of the young Mithra slaying the bull, was derived probably from the rites of Cybele, and shows the influence of the prevailing religious syncretism. It is difficult for us, as we look at the representations of the taurobolium which have come down to us, many of them quite revolting in their crude realism, even to imagine the feeling which they aroused in the devout worshipper. But they must have shadowed forth, in a way which words alone could never convey, the secret of the constant renewal of life and the power of sacrifice. It was, in any case, this strange emotional appeal presented through the symbol of an acted cosmic myth, its mystic rites and organised priesthood, its clear belief in immortality, and its severe and exacting moral code, which won for the religion of Mithra its rapid and wide-spread popularity. But in saying this we have hinted already at some of the sources of its decay. Like the other religions of the Empire, with the exception of Judaism and Christianity, it practised toleration and made compromises with other and more debasing forms of paganism. Its own teaching could appeal for its sanction, not to a real life, but only to a cosmic legend, which entered into easy alliance with the dark arts of magic and astrology. Finally it was a religion for strong men, for soldiers living under discipline, but it had no word of saving hope for the woman and the child. So far as it has been possible to decipher its fragmentary records and interpret its pictorial symbols, they show no trace of tenderness, of pity, or of the deep lessons of sorrow and suffering borne for the good of others; and for this reason it could never become a universal human religion.

It is no part of Professor Dill's scheme to bring Christianity upon the stage, to exhibit it in the stern conflict of ideals, or to explain the reasons of its victory. His pages are all the more impressive because Christianity is the one subject which is ignored. The picture, which he gives us, is one of the world as it must have appeared to an intelligent observer, when the religion of the Cross was still too obscure to be noticed. It is not the traditional picture of Christian apology. The familiar contrast between darkness and light, where the darkness rests in unrelieved gloom upon the pagan world and the light shines only in the Gospel, has disappeared. But it is only for a moment that this disappearance seems to lessen the divine claims of Christianity. To realise the deeper and more serious side of the civilisation of the Empire, to admire its civic virtue, to reverence the memory of its great teachers, to sympathise with the growth and ripening of its religious instincts, to feel the passionate longing not merely of its best minds, but also of the dim undistinguished crowd for spiritual satisfaction—all this is to gain, at the same time, new insight into the grace and truth of the religion which led it captive. It meant something far more than the subjugation of lust by love, when at last the symbolism of Mithra yielded to the symbol of the Crucified.

There is one other reflection, which has been borne in upon us again and again as we have read these pages, though probably without any intention on the part of the author. Rationalism may satisfy a coterie of philosophers, but it can never be a religion for the mass of mankind, and the moment of its apparent victory is also the moment of a strong recoil towards the symbols and the sacred rites, through which the pent-up life of the soul projects itself again into the mystery of the Unseen. Professor Dill himself reminds us that "the member of a comparatively small literary and thoughtful circle is apt to imagine that its ideas are more widely diffused than they really are." Religion will be judged in the future, as it has been judged always in the past, not by the clear rationality of its creed, but by its power of satisfying the unreasoning spiritual instincts of ordinary men, who are face to face with sorrow and sin, with life and death. Christianity won in the long conflict, not because there was nothing serious or reasonable in the other forms of worship through which men were feeling after God; but because it alone had the power to give peace of heart in the company of the redeemed, and to confer upon obscure and struggling lives a sense of supernatural privilege as fellow-citizens with the saints.

Good Words this month has an illustrated article on the British Museum Library, "The Greatest Library in the World." In the Sunday Magazine is an article, also illustrated, on the Working Men's College, which is about to be removed from Great Ormond-street to new premises in Crowndale-road, St. Pancras. The old house, where Maurice, the founder, worked, and Kingsley and Hughes, and, on the art side, Ruskin and Rossetti and Madox Brown were among the helpers, is to be absorbed in the adjoining Children's Hospital.

THE Hibbert Journal for April is one of the most interesting numbers which has yet appeared. The interest depends partly on the great variety of theological views expressed in the different articles, partly on the importance of the subjects dealt with, and partly on the ability and even brilliance of many of the writers. The noble ideal expressed by Mr. Jacks in the editorial preface to the first number has never been more fully realised. "We shall judge of opinions by the seriousness with which they are held, and the fairness and ability with which they are maintained. Among extant varieties of religious thought none is selected by us as the type to which the rest should conform." We aim at "providing a common ground for the literary expression of opinion."

The Broad Church is represented by the Bishop of Ripon in his eloquent plea for a more human and liberal education for ministers of religion. Strict orthodoxy is represented by Rev. C. F. Nolloth in his article on the "Resurrection of our Lord," in which he defends a belief in the bodily resurrection. "To die requires a body. To rise again, to live after death, requires a body. A spiritual "disembodied life is not human life in the "full true sense of the word. . . . To deny "the Resurrection of Christ is to destroy "the nature of the sacraments, and to "make of the Incarnation a temporary "phenomenon, not, as Scripture repre-"sents it, an eternal fact." These and other statements in Mr. Nolloth's article will sound amazing to many readers of the INQUIRER, but there is no one who will not welcome a treatment of the subject from this point of view. Differing as we do profoundly from Mr. Nolloth's conclusions we will not venture to appraise his ability. This only we will say. The man who really believes that the dead body laid in the grave returned to life and ate and drank with the disciples, and that belief in this stupendous miracle is one of the corner stones of Christianity, needs to be an exceptionally spiritual man to save his faith from appearing grossly materialistic. This spirituality we feel in such men as Canon Liddon or Cardinal Newman so that, however much we may differ from them, any materialistic basis of their faith seems swallowed up in a deep religious life. But, on the other hand, in a recent ridiculous but sadly popular story "When it was dark" approved by the Bishop of London, the stress laid on the physical resurrection, unredeemed by any spiritual faith in God or any real reverence for Christ, presents the Christian religion in a form hardly differing—except in its conclusions—from the position of Haeckel. Mr. Nolloth's article certainly does not belong to this type. Nevertheless the impression left upon us by him, and even more by the curious little pseudo-physiological speculation of Rev. E. Allen at the end of the Journal is one rather of fear for a religion that depends upon such arguments than of sympathetic interest for views which, however different from ours, may yet be considered as resulting from historical knowledge and religious insight.

Probably the two ablest articles in the Journal are those by the two philosophers, Professor Henry Jones and Mr. Sorley. That by Professor Jones on "Mr. Balfour as Sophist" might be taken as a model of the way in which one gentleman ought to treat another gentleman when the first thinks the second, on the particular point in question, little better than a fool. Professor Jones of course recognises Mr. Balfour's brilliant literary gifts and his personal charm and sincerity, but he evidently regards his attempts at philosophising as hopelessly confusing and irrational. While he makes his meaning clear, he does so with a delightfully delicate effectiveness quite free from that bitter spirit of contempt which is the bane of the philosophic critic. Mr. Balfour in his fight for religion "creates a solitude and calls it peace." He teaches that everything is uncertain, "reason, whatever her pretensions, is for the most part the mere editor and interpreter of the utterances of unreason," and then it seems after this universal scepticism the only comfort lies in the fact that at any rate religion is not more uncertain than everything else. In dealing with one of our leading modern sophists Professor Jones' article has something of the irony and all the unfailing courtesy of the great Socratic dialogues.

The two articles which will arouse the most strenuous opposition are those by Mr. Mallock and Mr. Garrod. The first is an attack on theism, the second an attack on Christian ethics. Mr. Mallock would probably say himself that his essay is an attack on certain theistic arguments not on theism. After a slashing assault on various arguments for believing in the goodness of God he closes by saying, "That the theistic position is capable of rational defence, I for one believe." We have read similar statements at the close of longer works of his. What Mr. Mallock appears to love is to render other people's convictions ridiculous and self-contradictory, and then to conclude with the suggestion that he could if he liked give them reasons for believing which even his brilliant dialectic could not overthrow. We wish he would do it or even show some signs of trying to do it. The present article is of course superior in character and tone to many of his books, but it does not seem to us to show much seriousness of conviction or any very genuine desire for truth.

The main point seems to be, let the opponents of theism allow to theists all the pre-suppositions they demand, and the theists will then be left face to face with difficulties which Mr. Mallock appears to think are insuperable except by himself. "What the theist is bound to prove," he says, "or his theism falls altogether to the ground— is that the human beings" produced by evolution "exhibit in their constitutions and their circumstances, if we treat the evidence fairly, an infinite and loving care concentrated on every one of them, by a God who purposed their existence with a view of their individual beatitude, the most precious element of this being an intimate union with Himself." No theist can possibly do this. He cannot give a full and satisfactory explanation of the dealings of God with every human being. He can say out of his own experience that he knows trouble and pain have had for him something of good in them, and that even when they did not bring help, he can feel it was want of will and courage and trust in God which made them harmful. He can say that he finds in all the great inspirers of men, character purified by conflict and by pain. He can say he knows many humble lives which have been made more beautiful and sacred through the way in which a cross of sickness or of poverty was borne. But the demand to explain every event and to find God's goodness, and nothing but God's goodness everywhere, is an impossible demand. We do not and we cannot know enough. This is not the question of a universal law, like that of gravity, it is a question of the personal relationship of God with each of a billion different individual souls. All we can say is that in our own case we recognise God's goodness, or at the very least, even when we fail to find it we believe it is due to our own want of life and love, and further that in the few whom we reverence most deeply, whose will is strongest, and whose spirit most alive, we find the clearest witness of the blessings which may come through sorrow or through pain.

Mr. Garrod's article on Christian, Greek, or Goth is a most suggestive and stimulating one, but it is eminently unsatisfactory to anyone who believes that Christian ethics at their best are the highest type of ethics yet attained. It is one of the most serious and brilliant challenges we have read to "all who profess and call themselves Christians" to defend not the outworks of their creed, but the inmost spirit of their moral ideal. There are three types of morality, he maintains; the Christian whose ideal is that of holiness; the Greek whose ideal is that of wisdom, and the Goth whose ideal is that of being a gentleman. "I do not believe," he says, "that the best men of to-day, the men who make progress, who carry the race forward, are really and truly much influenced by the ideal of either the saint or the wise man. They were born Christians, and therefore they honestly believe that they desire to be saints. They were taught Greek, and therefore they honestly believe that they bear an affection towards "sweetness and light." Nevertheless we only believe, as Emerson says, "as deep as we live. . . But even out of Church they do recognise one deadly sin. All sins save one they will forgive their neighbours until seventy times seven. But one sin hath no forgiveness"—the sin of not being a gentleman. "By not being a gentleman I understand failure in two ideals—the ideal of chivalry and the ideal of honour. I believe that anyone who seriously interrogates his conscience will, if he continues the process for a sufficient time, come to admit that these two ideals are more really than any others the regulating principles of what he calls his moral life. These two ideals, chivalry and honour, are neither Greek nor Christian. They are the peculiar property and creation of the northern races. I may call them the cardinal virtues of Gothic morality."

The conclusion of the whole matter is "Let us cease to call ourselves Christians when we do not follow Christ." He shows a "widespread dissatisfaction with the ideals of Christianity," and he will not take refuge in Hellenism, although he likes Hellenism much better than Christianity. "Let us remember that we ourselves are of the north," and let us therefore neither be Christian or Greek in our ideals, but Goths and gentlemen.

We have heard much of the Gothic revival in architecture, but no one, so far as we are aware, claims that Gothic architecture was not largely the creation of the Christian religion. Here we have a very interesting and serious attempt to produce a Gothic revival in morality coupled with the amazing assertion that Gothic morality is only so far influenced by Christianity as to be "an undefined and instinctive protest against it."

We have no space for many remarks. We would only say, first, that it is dangerously superficial to divide up morality into racial compartments as though none but Christians had desired holiness, none but Greeks wisdom, and none but Goths honour. Mr. Garrod cites the popularity of Odysseus as a proof that "there were no Greek gentlemen." Surely this is a little sweeping if applied to the age of Pericles or Plato. We have no more right to read the character of Plato in the light of Odysseus than we have to read that of Isaiah in the light of Jacob.

Secondly, It is not in the least self-evident, and is most unlikely that the modern ideal of chivalry and honour is pure Gothic, and quite unaffected by Christianity. Much that is best in the ideal of a true gentleman we believe to be largely the result of Christianity.

Thirdly, What Mr. Garrod calls holiness or the Christian ideal we regard as a caricature of Christianity. He paints the Christian ideal as something "unnatural, pusillanimous, impossible": it seems to him summed up in asceticism and hatred of the world. We admit that the difficulty of co-ordinating the various sayings of Jesus into one ethical system is great: we admit also that if you look at the influence of Christianity upon various types and characters of men in the early ages it is difficult to find one definite ideal. But that the new ethical spirit of Christianity meant nothing more than a new asceticism and hatred of the world seems wholly untenable. It could hardly be maintained by any one who had studied the life of St. Francis of Assisi or the works of Dante. Probably the inmost spirit of Christianity is given in the words of Goethe, "Stirb und Werde," and more fully in the words, "He that would lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall find it." Anyone who calls that mere asceticism and hatred of the world cannot be regarded as a true interpreter of the spirit and the teaching of Jesus.

THE further notice of Mr. Carpenter's "Martineau" book we must hold over until next week.

THE JOWETT LECTURES.

ON Wednesday evening the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter gave the tenth and last of his course of Jowett Lectures at the Passmore-Edwards settlement, Tavistock-place. The subject of the lectures, it will be remembered, was "The Earliest Sources of the Life of Jesus: a Study of the Literary Relations and the Historical Value of the First Three Gospels," and the three last lectures dealt in turn with "Mark," "Luke," and "Matthew." The concluding lecture gave a most interesting account of striking literary features and theological and religious characteristics of "Matthew," the latest of the three, which has been called, on account of the very various elements gathered up in it, early and late, and sometimes contradicting one another, "A Gospel of contradictions." Among the points of special interest were notes on the late additions to the text, such as that about "on this rock" in Peter's confession of the Messiahship, which was unknown to Irenæus, and the baptismal formula at the end of the Gospel, which Eusebius in his earlier works repeatedly does not quote, citing the verse in a simpler form, and only begins to use after the Council of Nicæa in 325, a matter of history on which Mr. Conybeare had thrown such interesting light. At the conclusion of his lecture, Mr. Carpenter said that the new way of reading the Gospels, which he had been illustrating made, it was true, some things uncertain. They could no longer attempt to reconstruct the biography of Christ; they did not know certainly the date either of his birth or death; but while they could not recover those outward facts, they could penetrate, by the instruments of modern research, into what was much more significant, the spiritual teaching of Jesus. That was the great value of the Gospels. They embodied in broken and distorted lines the elements of that great soul, who more than any other of the sons of men had penetrated the very life of this world, and given to it the highest elements of its spiritual life. In "Luke" he had pointed out how the main stress fell on the relations of the individual, the disciples to the Master, the child to the Father, the brotherhood of men among themselves. In "Matthew" the stress fell on a different conception, on the idea of the Kingdom of God. That had perhaps a larger and wider significance. The conception of the Kingdom of God as enriched by Jesus from Hebrew prophecy was the priceless hope of the human race. Taken with that great word, "Be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect," it involved the fullest development of every man as the child of God, the fullest use of all his powers of brain and heart, of mind, creative genius, and spiritual capacity; yet not to be used for selfish ends or solely for individual welfare, but for the benefit of the whole. That was the magnificent conception which Jesus had contributed to their social religion. As they read the Gospels in the light of history, some beliefs, enshrined in the old creeds, would pass away, but there would remain that which outlasts all formulæ, the imperishable aspiration after the realisation of God's purpose for the race, the education of mankind as the sons of God. The churches might for a time be shaken, ecclesiastical orders and dogmatic constructions might totter and fall, but men would still pray the ancient prayer: "Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name"; and their idea of hallowing the name of God would be that which Jesus taught, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

At the close a member of the audience proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Carpenter for his lectures, and this was very cordially passed, having been seconded by the Rev. F. H. Jones, who said that as Secretary of the Hibbert Trust he was glad to join in that expression of thanks, and he was sure the Trustees would be much gratified to hear how the lectures had been appreciated.

The attendance throughout the course was well maintained, and on Wednesday evening numbered over a hundred. On each previous evening the greater number of those present had stayed after the regular lecture for a further talk, which practically amounted to a second lecture, thus testifying to the keen interest felt in the subject and the lecturer's treatment of it.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XIX.

Archbishop Trench, in his lecture on the morality of words, says that human speech is richer in words that set forth sins than in words that set forth graces. This is only too true. The list of the works of the flesh in St. Paul is twice as long as the list of the fruits of the spirit, and in every dictionary the names of vices will be found to be far more numerous than the names of virtues. "Inventors of evil things" are very soon inventors of evil words to excuse them, for the process of invention, as might be expected, is also a process of skilful refinement. Take the sins of the tongue in the New Testament. They are coarse and crude, and are rendered by English expressions which are equally outspoken—slander, false witness, evil speaking, back-biting, whispering, railing, reviling. To not one of these offences would we plead guilty. They have a savour of the police-court. If we were pressed, we might perhaps confess to a little occasional detraction. Detraction is not slander, as Barrow has shown; is some degrees removed; and slander has been left far behind when we come to disparagement. Yet I am not sure that, of all these various shades of one offence, the last is not the darkest. The French dénigrement gives the true complexion.

The Latin language can always be drawn upon for terms which shall not too much betray their meaning. We have now at our command an elegant vocabulary for polite violations of the Ninth Commandment. Depreciation is one of these new terms; insinuation is another; disparagement is a third. The delicate practices for which they stand are difficult to challenge; and evil ways which cannot easily be exposed are, as a rule, the most deadly.

The structure of the word disparagement is instructive. To disparage is to hint at disparity and inequality. We disparage those who come too closely into comparison with us, by hinting that they are not all that they seem to be. We may do this without committing ourselves to positive statement. An apparently innocent question is quite enough.

The whole story of the opposition to Christ in the Gospels is a story of disparagement, and the form it takes is generally that of derogation by interrogation: Is not this the carpenter? Are not his sisters here with us? Hath any of the rulers believed on him? By what authority doest thou these things? Art thou greater than our father Abraham? Who is this Son of man? Jesus of Nazareth, whom they all knew, was both one of them, and not one of them, and this was the offence. In the absence of actual fault, and therefore of opportunity for definite charge, damaging questions could still be asked. As prophet a prophet claims to be judged, but by quite irrelevant suggestion and connection he may be made to lose honour where he should most receive it—in his own country, and among his own kin.

Loss of honour means also loss of power. This perhaps is the meaning of the words: He could there do no mighty works. He marvelled because of their unbelief. There is a vital connection between working and believing. According to the trust given to us, so is our strength to bless and reward it. There is nothing which so much cripples us as the irrelevant things said about us, the irrelevant questions asked concerning us, and nothing so much quickens and increases the ability to act as the confidence behind us which bears us on beyond our own anticipation. Many a man's position has been undermined, and his influence for good quite scattered, by idle and unthinking slight, by needless, gratuitous comparison. There is everything about us to encourage the disparaging habit, for we belong to a satirical age which loves to throw its thoughts into finely worded epigram and allusive jest. That which is divine in men is thus kept back—though able to do mighty works—for lack of the encouragement of faith.

The first Christian writers made much of the contrary habit, which magnifies others at the cost of self. "Honour all men" is the rule given for preventing prejudice; "In honour preferring one another" was the safeguard against rivalry; "Let each esteem other better than himself" was the remedy for pride. Thus only could the crown of charity be reached. They were mindful of the day when their own characters would be at stake, and of the warning, "Judge not, that ye be not judged." Graver even than this recollection was the remembrance that the Master himself had been misjudged.

THE godless lover of gain and the gainless lover of God are fanatics both, taking hold of the opposite ends of the same falsehood. And the truth which suffices to rebuke them both, is this: that the kingdom of God is not a business, set up in rivalry with worldly business; but a divine law regulating, and a divine temper pervading the pursuits of worldly business. It does not change the materials, but the form and spirit, of our life.—Martineau.

OBITUARY.

MRS. REBECCA MOORE.

MRS. REBECCA MOORE, widow of Robert Ross Rowan Moore, died at her residence, 7, Park-road, Richmond, on May 8, in her eighty-sixth year. She was the oldest member of our Richmond Free Church. At the close of last Sunday morning's service, at the request of the Rev. Felix Taylor, its present minister, the Rev. Silas Farrington said a few words of appreciation of her long, brave, energetic life—of a nature alive at so many points; full of such eager interest in other people, and in the world around in all its varied aspects; especially in all its social strivings and gropings toward better things. This, Mr. Farrington said, is what struck everyone who knew her: this alertness, this unflagging vivacity of nature, that made her so open to the new light, and the new hopes, and new endeavours of her day, so eager to identify herself with all the efforts our time has made to right old wrongs and abolish old evils. When I first knew her, more than thirty years ago, she was in the full activity of her powers. There was hardly any movement toward good, toward education, toward social reform, toward moral reform that she did not actively promote. She was never deterred by the unpopularity of such movements; by the fear of ridicule, or the fear of offence, or the fear of loss, from throwing her whole influence into them. Some of us remember how much enthusiasm and vivacity—above all how much fidelity—she brought with her in the early days of this church; and we all know how steady her attachment remained when no longer able to join in our services here.

Those who have had the privilege of intercourse with her to the last, know how wonderfully she kept the same alertness of mind—the same eagerness to know—the same hopes of good—through the growing infirmities of age. There is something invigorating in this large-minded interest in life that keeps the mental powers fresh and active; so that while one is giving out all the time, one receives more than one gives out.

On Friday week a few gathered for the funeral service of our dear friend at Golders Hill. The frail and shrunken form lay there waiting for the moment when it would be resolved into ashes. The eyes that no longer saw, the ears that no longer heard, the hands that no longer moved, the brain that no longer thought, the heart that no longer beat; they were now going back to their primal elements. They were done with. They were of no use to our friend any more. But, after all, the sense of life was stronger than the sense of death. The sense of that ardent outstretching life of eighty-five years, which had counted nothing human foreign to its sympathy; which had shared such wide and varied friendships; which had laboured so cheerfully, and borne trials with so much reticence and dignity; the sense of that life was strongest. I thought of what she had often said of late in her weakness—that she had finished here, and that now she wanted to see what was on the other side. And I was glad to trust that now, with other eyes, she did see; to trust that she had indeed begun that fresh, new, experience, whatever it be, which lies beyond this life—imagined so vaguely and so dimly, and yet hoped for so ardently, believed in so persistently, by our human hearts—an experience as satisfying as it is strange!

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.

III.

ROSE: "BE SWEET AND KIND!"

"THE rose doth deserve the chiefest and most principal place among all flowers whatsoever, being not only esteemed for his beautie, vertues, and his fragrant and oderiferous smell, but also because it is the honore and ornamente of our English sceptre."

This is what a botanist, John Gerarde, wrote about the rose more than 300 years ago, and it describes very much what everyone feels now about our roses. No other flower has so many legends written about it, and no other flower has a better known name in history. It is difficult to choose out the most interesting legends from among such a number, but I think one of the best is one of the Eastern tales telling us how roses were given their beautiful colour. All the ancient writers agree that the first roses were white, and this legend tells us how red ones came to exist.

A fair young maiden had been unjustly accused, and condemned to be burnt, and as the faggots were lighted, she prayed aloud that "as truly as she was not guilty, God would make it known to all." At the close of her prayer, she walked into the burning pile, and at that same moment a shower of rain fell from heaven, the flames were extinguished, and the sticks all turned into roses, the ones that were not lighted being white roses, and the burning sticks the first red roses that had ever been seen.

For all English people, the rose has a special interest, because it has always been such an abundant flower in our country, and has so often been mentioned as typical of England. An old Roman writer says that our island may have taken its early name of Albion from the quantities of white roses (rosae albae) growing in it. From the days of the wars of the roses, at any rate, this flower has become the national badge of England. The Houses of York and Lancaster had the rose as a family badge long before that time, the wild white rose being chosen by the House of York, and the red rose by the House of Lancaster.

In Westminster Abbey, the place that the rose holds in history is very plainly seen. The Tudors made their particular family rose, a wide opened, seven petalled flower, and this you can see for yourselves in endless numbers, on tombs, and gates, and pillars, and ceilings, especially in Henry the Seventh's Chapel. He had a border made right round the chapel walls, of angels holding crowns over an alternate portcullis and rose, the portcullis showing his mother's family badge, and the rose his father's. At the east end of the Chapel, is a window which has in it some of the oldest stained glass in the Abbey. Here you can see one rose, half red and half white, the only one you will find divided in this way to show the union of the two families. It was put there by Henry the Seventh, when he had married Elizabeth of York, and wanted to show that the wars were at an end, and the families of the red and white roses united peacefully together.

The rose is now considered to be the emblem of all that is sweet and lovely, and we must hope it will never again have to lend its name to a time of war and sadness.

There is a very pretty legend of the origin of the moss-rose.

One day the Angel of Flowers, who watches over them and waters them with sweet dews from heaven, went to sleep beneath a rose-tree. When he waked, he whispered to the rose: "Oh! sweetest flower, for whom I care the most, I thank thee for thy nice cool shade, which has given me such refreshing rest. In return, ask what thou wilt, and I will give it thee!"

Then the rose, blushing a still deeper pink, replied: "Give me yet another grace."

The angel waited a moment, wondering what grace there was that the flower had not already won, and then suddenly he threw a veil of moss over it, and thus, dressed in nature's most modest garment, the rose became still more beautiful and beloved by all.

It is interesting too, to see the place it has in French history. As long ago as 1224, it was settled that the youngest peer of France was to offer a basket of roses three times a year to the members of the courts of Parliament. This was called "The tribute of roses," (la baillée des roses) and ended by becoming a great public ceremony and feast. The offering of roses lasted for a great many years, and in some parts of France there is still a very pretty custom, which reminds us of our English custom of keeping May Day. In the middle of the summer, the chief people in a village meet and consult together, and then choose the most amiable and good girl amongst the villagers, who is called "La Rosière," and has a sum of money given to her, and a wreath of roses, which she well deserves to wear.

It is a nice thought to have, when you see a rose, that sometimes it is taken as the emblem of a kind word. Have you ever thought how long the memory of a kind word lasts? It is so easy to say, and gives so much pleasure, and is altogether something so beautiful and helpful, that this is perhaps the best meaning of all that we can give a rose. I think the poet, who wrote these lines must have had some such idea:—

"Long, long be my heart with sweet memories filled,
Like the vase in which roses have once been distilled.
You may break—you may ruin the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still!"

THE TRUST OF OUR MISSIONS.

WE ask the attention of our readers, and particularly of the members of our London churches, for the report of the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society. We should be glad to think that in all the churches the reports of the missionaries will be read and taken to heart. The three missions supported by this society, and the kindred missions in Blackfriars and Bethnal Green, not to mention others with work very similar in kind, constitute a trust the seriousness of which cannot be over-estimated, which ought to be borne upon the heart and conscience of our whole community of churches. Here in the simplest form of brotherly helpfulness, in close touch with the most grievous problems of crowded city life, and the most pathetic needs of the neglected poor, our devoted missionaries, sustained in each instance by an earnest band of helpers, are striving to do the work of Christian faith and love. And this is our work. This is the chief instrument we have in London for demonstrating the power of ministry nourished in our churches. There is no work nobler in its ideal, more absolutely true to the Master's spirit, in the simplicity of its self-forgetfulness, in its desire to give and to help where the need is greatest. If we desire unity and a new energy of common life and purpose in our churches, here is the channel of faithfulness through which they may best be won.

We have often wished of late years that, instead of separate and somewhat scantily attended annual meetings of several missions, or, perhaps, in addition to these, we might have one evening of the year set apart for a gathering in force of all those in our churches who are devoted to this work, and those who believe in it and share in its support, for mutual counsel and encouragement, for reconsecration and fresh inspiration. Such a meeting would at least mark our sense of the importance of the work, and, if the speaking and the listening were adequate to the occasion, would surely set other hearts on fire to join the ranks in this unselfish service. More used to be made of the annual meeting of the Domestic Mission Society itself. A special preacher was invited for the Sunday before the meeting, and was heard by two of the leading congregations. Fifty years ago it was W. H. CHANNING; three years earlier it was JAMES MARTINEAU; at the Jubilee of the Society in 1885 it was CHARLES BEARD. That, we believe, is the last time when such emphasis was laid upon the annual occasion. There may have been good reasons for the change of practice, and what we have specially in mind now is some meeting in which the members of all the churches should unite. Certainly some fresh method of concentrating interest and effort on this work is greatly to be desired.

Dr. FORSYTH, in his address last week as Chairman of the Congregational Union, spoke some searching words as to the true aim of a church. He was pleading for a better understanding between the Free Churches and the forces of Labour, which could not come through considerations of self-interest on either side, and least of all on the side of the Church. "It is not there," he said, "for itself, but for its Gospel and Kingdom. And a real understanding is not possible between self-seeking and self-sacrifice. It can only exist between parties who care more for something beyond themselves than for any aggrandisement of their class or their sect." Then he went on to say that the church could only exercise its true power when it was utterly surrendered to the spirit of holiness, and in self-forgetfulness was given up to the service of that high ideal. "And this same Gospel," he said, "that makes the Church holy is the only principle that can make Society either safe, just, or glorious. Let us not be content with a ministry of kindness, but of equity also. It is not a matter of almsgiving, but of giving ourselves, of going to neighbours, making them brothers, and making their interests our own."

We may not interpret the doctrine of the church as Dr. Forsyth does, and may find that the compelling power of the Gospel comes to us by a different way, but we feel these words to be absolutely true, and to have a very special application to the duty of our churches in this matter of the Domestic Missions. It was clearly pointed out on Tuesday how great is the opportunity in that work, not only for the exercise of a genuine ministry of brotherly kindness, but for the gaining of experience, in close touch with the realities of life among the poor, that will train a wisdom and kindle a passion of reforming zeal, which must become effectual in a true ministry of equity and social regeneration.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE seventieth annual meeting of the Mission was held in the Essex Church School-room, Kensington, on Tuesday evening, when there was a fair attendance of members and friends. The chair was taken by Mr. P. M. Martineau, in the absence of Sir John Brunner, who was to have presided.

Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE, the treasurer, presented the accounts, which showed that the expenses for the three mission stations had amounted to £1,199 14s. 6d., and the general expenses of the society to £43 15s. 8d. The total income of £1,255 7s. 7d. included a donation of £100 in memory of the late Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, and £150 14s. 8d. raised by the bazaar organised at George's-row by Mr. and Mrs. Summers. The subscriptions amounted to £755 6s. There had also been a legacy of £250 from the late Mr. William Thornely, which was treated as capital. The result was an adverse balance reduced from £66 6s. 9d. to £54 9s. 4d. If it had not been for the George's-row bazaar, the treasurer pointed out, the adverse balance would have amounted to £200, and that was the prospect for the present year. It was the 70th annual meeting they were holding, and during those years they had accumulated about £3,000, but a great deal more than that had been spent on the work of the Mission, which was one of the oldest and finest of the institutions carried on by the Free Churches, and if they had to part with their investments to carry on the work it would be sad indeed. They ought to have a larger subscription list, which would mark the amount of interest taken in that work. While, therefore, he asked for increased subscription, he pleaded still more urgently for new subscribers, to extend the field of interest in their work. He wished they could interest a larger number of young people, because from them the ranks must be recruited.

The Rev. HENRY GOW read the Committee's report, which, with the reports of the Rev. F. Summers, of George's-row, St. Luke's, Dr. Read, of Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, and the Rev. S. H. Street, of Bell-street, Marylebone, had been previously printed.

The report recorded a year comparatively uneventful, with no new developments, but a year of patient, faithful work. The aim of the missionaries and their helpers was the building up of character. "The faith which animates our missionaries," it was said, "is a faith in God and in men as the children of God. The appeal is always an appeal to what is good in man. The aim of our Missions through all their various activities is to develop a love for whatever is beautiful and good. They provide opportunities for simple and innocent pleasures, they foster health of body and mind, they seek to stimulate the intellect and to touch the emotions. Above all, by personal influence and affection the missionaries and their helpers try to strengthen men and women against temptation, to build up the character of children, and to give to all a deeper faith in religion." Last June,

Mr. and Mrs. Summers arranged a bazaar in celebration of the completion by them of twenty-five years of active service at George's-row, and by means of that effort were able to hand over £150 to the treasurer of the Society. The occasion was also taken by the friends of the Mission to make a presentation to Mr. Summers of a cheque for £240 and of a gold watch and chain to Mrs. Summers. In connection with Rhyl-street, it was noted how valuable Dr. Read's special medical knowledge proved. At Bell-street attendances were increasing, and there was need of more help in the Sunday-school and for provident collecting. And the report proceeded :—

"The past winter has been a very trying one for all our missionaries, owing to the exceptional distress resulting from want of employment in many industries. Large sums of money have been raised and distributed by civic and charitable agencies, and our missionaries have co-operated whenever possible with such agencies by giving their advice and personal assistance. There are probably few who have a better opportunity of knowing the condition and character of the poor than our missionaries, and few who know so well how money can be given when necessary with most effect and least injury to the self-respect of the recipient.

"The Committee heartily thank the missionaries and all their helpers for whatever good work they have done. There are many other ways in which beneficent and useful work is being carried on among the poor, but the Committee are confident that there is no way in which more effective and lasting influence can be exerted than that which is implied in the spirit and the methods of a true Domestic Mission.

"Many old and generous subscribers and friends have recently been removed by death. The Committee earnestly appeal to the young members of our Free Churches to come forward and fill the vacant places, and to assist by money and by personal service in carrying on a work which was never more needed than it is to-day."

THE MISSIONARIES' REPORTS.

The reports of the three missionaries gave full particulars of all the varied activities which centre in the Missions, and were also of great value on account of the more general considerations they presented as to the conditions of life among the people and the problems which have to be faced. The whole of the reports should be read; we can only give some extracts here.

From the Rev. F. Summers' Report of George's-row Mission.

"In former reports I have referred to the changing aspect of this district of Central London. Once consisting of the more respectable poor, it has now become one in which some of the roughest elements of society abound. On this account, of course, the Mission is not less, but more wanted. The work, however, becomes harder and harder, and certainly apparent results are more difficult to achieve. And here I make special appeal for outside assistance. I am sure that at George's-row anybody who feels called upon to do any kind of good work in the general process of refining some of the dregs of society—and caught in the process of formation this is quite possible—would find ample scope for work and a hearty welcome from me. How glad I should be of anyone who would volunteer to assist!

"During the past year, in common with many other parts of London, the 'out-of-work' problem has pressed very hard indeed. I have been working on committees and bodies outside as well as directly in the Mission itself. Much labour and visitation have been needed, but it must be confessed that the result has not been entirely satisfactory. In some cases labour and men have been brought together, and actual good has been done. But in many cases the greatest inadaptibility to changed forms of activity has been discovered. The men who cannot do this or that, or do it to any real purpose, are indeed many compared with those who can turn their hand in this direction when there is no opportunity of turning it in another. Nor is this always the fault of the men themselves. It is rather more the result of that extraordinary splitting up of productive labour into the very smallest details of manufacture, which gives absolutely no outlook to the mind over the complete but varied process of transformation from the raw material to the finished article. The present highly-organised and diversified methods of production seem to be gradually eliminating human adaptability and even general knowledge from the minds of the rank and file of men. Breadth, indeed, is in the machine—narrowness in the minds of men."

From Dr. Read's Report of Rhyl-street Mission.

Dr. Read referred to the Government Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Physical Deterioration (Vol. I. Wyman and Sons, Fetter-lane. 1s. 2d.), issued as a Blue Book last July, and spoke of it as follows :—

"That report makes it abundantly clear that physical degeneration exists to a considerable extent amongst the poorer classes, and an analysis of the causes leading to it shows that over-crowding of the home, and the under-feeding of children, are undoubtedly large factors in the production of that result. And yet these conditions seem almost inseparably associated with poverty, unless a large-hearted and clear-headed wisdom can devise means whereby the poor can be better housed and fed. It is a task of such difficulty and complexity that to deal with it on a large scale our legislature must take it in hand, and that it has not already done so after the issue of this report, was made the subject of complaint by Sir John Gorst in Parliament only last month (March 22). Sir John said, the neglect of the Government and the various departments concerned with the report of the Commission had filled him with consternation. The time for inquiry had passed, and the time for action of some kind had come, and he warned the Government that he would raise the matter in season and out of season. 'You shall not get rid of me,' he said, 'till you have taken the matter in hand seriously.' Surely such a philanthropic spirit in our public men is a harbinger of a better and brighter social day. What is wanted is a large-hearted sentiment of public interest in these social questions, a healthy public conscience in matters of hygiene affecting the poor, and then our Government will be compelled to move in this matter, and to grapple with these complex social problems that defy the efforts of our Churches to deal with them effectively.

* * * * *

"I constantly feel the force of the words of Lord Shaftesbury spoken in relation to the better housing of the poor. 'I am certain,' said he, 'that I speak the truth, and a truth which can be confirmed by all experienced persons—clergy, medical men, and all who are conversant with the working class—that until their housing conditions are Christianised, all hope of moral or social improvement is utterly in vain.' I can but echo the truth of these words, for where the over-crowding is such that even the common decencies of life can hardly be observed, how can we expect the moral and spiritual elements of the nature to develop? You cannot grow grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles.

* * * * *

"What then, I would ask, is our manifest duty in relation to such facts as these, representing as they do, so much human degradation and misery, and leading, as a natural and inevitable result, to so much loss and injury to the national life? Surely it is our most religious duty as Christian men and women to take a deep interest in all matters of social reform; to study them intelligently and carefully as far as lies in our power, so that we may help to create a large-hearted public conscience in relation to them; for this alone can furnish the motive power that will ultimately bring about a renovated state of society in which poverty with all the evils that necessarily spring from it shall no longer exist."

From the Rev. S. H. Street's Report of the Bell-street Mission.

"These instances [of painful overcrowding] are not in any sense peculiar or exceptional, and could be multiplied to almost any extent, and it is necessary further to remember that in the same houses in which these people live every room is occupied more or less in the same way. Children are everywhere, noise everywhere. There is no privacy, no quiet to be found anywhere. Happily the very publicity of this life is a protection against many of the evils towards which this overcrowding would seem naturally to tend. The result of all this is that home—as we think of that word—has hardly any meaning for many of our people. The connection between the members of one family is often of the slightest kind. They have a common sleeping and eating place, though seldom a common meal-hour, and for the rest, their life is outside—the children at school and in the streets, the adults, when not at work, at the street corners or in clubs or public-houses, or somewhere outside the home where their social life centres, the adult sons in one direction, the adult daughters in another, and the children in a third. The friends, the occupations, the interests of one member of a family are often wholly unknown to the others. These spare hours are, however, for the most part, not numerous. The men work less hours than the women, and have more spare time on their hands. The hours indeed that many of our girls have to work is distressing. From 8.30 in the morning to 8 at night on five days a week and 8.30 to 3 on Saturdays is by no means unusual; and in some cases, at some kinds of work, girls will have to put in the same time on Saturdays as well. Is it to be wondered at that so many of the girls in our district are anæmic and hysterical? Is it to be wondered at that we find so many of the children weak in body and in mind, if their mothers have to live so many important years of their lives under such conditions? This overworking of girls is one of the crying evils of our time, and is not only a disgrace to our civilisation, but, I believe a danger to the future efficiency of our race."

THE ADOPTION OF THE REPORTS.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports and accounts, expressed their regret that Sir John Brunner had not come, and the hope that he might yet arrive, and then spoke of the great need of helpers at the three Missions. Fifty years ago it was rather the habit of their young men and women to take part in that Mission work. They might be doing equally good work at the present time, but times and modes of life had changed, and their young people did not come forward in the same way to engage in regular work. He hardly knew how the Missions could get on, if they had not trained up so many workers themselves. That was specially noticeable at George's-row; and it was his opinion that in the future they would get most help from those who had been raised up in the missions themselves. Money they could at all times get by great effort, and they would do so again; but it was the help of heart and brain and loving-kindness which was not so easy to get, and for which they were the more grateful.

Mrs. W. WALLACE BRUCE seconded the resolution. In reading the reports she had been struck, she said, by the two-fold use of such work. There was its direct bearing on the lives of the poor, which appealed to all their hearts, and there was, secondly, its immense value, as a source of information for those who are engaged in legislative work. A large proportion of the efforts of the missions went at present in meeting trouble which ought not to exist. It was not the fault of the people, but it constituted all the social problems which were so pressing and which so many were now trying to solve. One great problem was that of want of work. She had been last week in the Midlands, where at Leicester they had the dreary procession of the unemployed going through the streets and carrying out the idea of attending in force at the different churches on Sunday. Just as in London, it was a terribly depressing sight, and brought the problem home to them. Yet, at the same time, they heard that dairy farming was in absolute jeopardy for want of labour; and cheesemaking was in the Midlands a declining industry for the same reason. The unskilled labour was attracted to London, and swelled the ranks of the unemployed. One wanted to know how far it was the housing question which made the difficulty in the country, or how far it was the modern love of excitement and the dislike of drudgery. The farmers could not get the young people to do the dreary work. While there was that cry of back to the land, it was very sad that a great industry should be suffering from want of labour, while in the great towns there were the crowds of the unemployed. While she sympathised with all her heart with the first object of the Missions, she felt very deeply the need of creating public opinion on those problems, and bringing its force to bear on legislation.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

Mr. F. W. PETHICK LAWRENCE moved a resolution of confidence in the principles of the Mission, and appreciation of the earnest and faithful labours of the missionaries. The resolution, he said, obviously commended itself to their support, to those who knew the men and had seen what they were doing. He concurred with what Mrs. Bruce had said as to the value of the reports, as an attempt to study and solve the social problem which was so serious at the present time. The housing difficulty and the matter of physical deterioration were specially serious in their effect on the lives of the people. It was important to look behind the immediate causes of the worst social evils. The great point to be brought home to the people was the dignity of human life and the dignity of labour, and the necessity of protecting human life and the great vital interests in every department of being against some of the powers exercised by money, the growing strength of capital and combination. He spoke of the enormous power of the two greatest combinations, the Morgan Shipping Combination and the Steel Trust; and while the effect of such a development in a great industry, as in the case of the Cadburys at Bourneville, might be beneficial, it was right that the community should see and understand the dangers involved. The first danger was to the man himself. In carrying on such a business he had to walk very warily, if he was going to play fair, and avoid doing mean actions towards the smaller men. Then there was the industrial danger, in relation to the workpeople. The head of such a great business only saw his men as hands—he might not even know how many he employed—and the one idea of his subordinates was to make as much money as possible. Thus the actual men and women who formed the great bulk of the state ceased to be looked upon as people with human interests; they were liable to dismissal, to be out of work, with no one to feel responsibility for their position. The economic danger was very serious, because the big combines had the power of monopoly, to make large profits at the public expense; they crushed out competitors, driving good men to the wall, not through any fault of theirs, but by the mere force of the system. Then there was moral and political danger. That enormous power could be used politically against the good of the community to further the interests of the business. He quoted the instance of the Standard Oil Company in the United States, an interest which reached out far beyond its own organisation through other companies and trusts, and had been an evil influence in American politics. He also referred to the position of Alfred Beit, whose interest in the gold mines, in Rhodesia, and as an administrator of Rhodes's will gave him control of a revenue greater than that of the whole Government of South Africa. He was more powerful than the State itself, and could bring ruin on the country any day by closing down his mines. Having given further instances of the moral and political danger of such a state of things, Mr. Lawrence said that in other forms we were faced by the same dangers in this country, through the power of large concerns to influence public opinion, to buy up newspapers, &c. The danger was very real and serious, one of the greatest they had now to face. The ultimate issue was how to subordinate vested interests to the interest of the community as a whole. They must make quite sure that they set human life before money, that they were on the side of life, against the side of money. There was great danger that they might join the wrong side. The vested interests were very much more respectable. They had the intellectual men on their side and could put a case. And on the other side was the dumb, illiterate, obstinate mass of the people. Yet they knew that really the people were right, because they understood that human life was the one important thing. If moderate people, who could put their case, threw in their lot with the right side, there was a chance that when the ultimate issue came, they might win quietly and the result would be justice. But if the moderate people were on the wrong side, the issue would yet be the same, only it would come violently and in the wrong way.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS, in seconding, said that while they were always glad to pass that resolution, and did so every year with the utmost sincerity, they were thankful to know that a much more constant and strenuous expression of sympathy with the missionaries was furnished by the many friends who in various ways worked with them at the Missions. He wished there had been a larger attendance at that meeting, representative of the whole body of their churches, to join in passing the resolution, that they might have realised together more deeply how that was their common work and a trust which was in their hands. He referred to some of the annual meetings of half a century ago, when the attendance was much larger and more representative, and particularly to the meeting of 1853, when Dr. Martineau had come up from Liverpool to preach the sermons (the collections at the two services amounted to more than £100), and at the annual meeting spoke of the Missions as "incomparably the most important institutions to which our body or any religious body can devote its zeal," pleading that all should help in the work, not only for its own sake, but that Christian love and vital energy might be revived in the churches themselves. Conditions were no doubt different now from what they were fifty years ago, and many of their people were doing similar work in other connections; and yet they ought not to forget that those Missions were their own special work. They offered a great opportunity not only for the doing of much-needed service, but also for the training of their young people in a knowledge of the conditions of life among the people, by which they would gain first-hand knowledge of the needs and problems of the time, and be fitted to render good service as citizens, and it might be as legislators, and be fired by an effectual reforming zeal.

The CHAIRMAN, in putting the resolution, which was heartily carried, expressed their great indebtedness to Mr. and Mrs. Summers for what they had done in the matter of the George's-row bazaar.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS, in acknowledging the vote, said that he must leave the larger questions of reform to others, but that he had his own work, which he thought was as much needed, in strengthening the character of his people, guarding the young from temptation, and leading them up to a true life. What they wanted was to get into the working classes a certain amount of grit, to bring out the manhood and the womanhood in them. He mentioned that they were about to hold a rummage sale at the Mission, for which they invited contributions of every kind.

The Rev. S. H. STREET said that the Missions represented the grandest work their churches had done, and in spite of changed conditions they could not do without the help of people of culture and education. It was not right that that work should be left to those who were attached to the Mission, who were overworked throughout the week. He asked for help especially in the Sunday-school, and spoke of the great value of the personal influence of teachers. The great hope of their work lay in the children. Their Missions ought to be made at least as attractive as the public-house.

Dr. READ, in his response, gave more particulars on the lines of his report as to the condition of the people, the terrible results of overcrowding and under-feeding of the children. The cost of the schooling in elementary schools, he said, was 1s. 2d. per child, but that was often practically wasted, because the child, through lack of proper food, was incapable of learning. Yet a halfpenny rate in London would provide the necessary food. It would be better to spend 1s. 2½d. per child than waste the 1s. 2d. on many of them. On such matters they must do all they could to rouse the public conscience.

On the motion of Mr. RICHARD WORSLEY, seconded by the Rev. F. K. FREESTON, the committee and officers were then appointed, and a vote of thanks to the chairman and speakers and the Essex Church congregation, moved by the Rev. H. GOW, and seconded by Miss HELEN HERFORD, brought the meeting to a close.

WESTERN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Assembly of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches took place at Plymouth, on Wednesday, May 10, and was well attended.

The annual sermon was preached in Treville-street Chapel by Rev. WALTER LLOYD, who took as his text the words, "Can ye not discern the signs of the times?" and "With freedom did Christ set us free." In an eloquent discourse the preacher addressed himself to the question whether the signs of the times were favourable to the prospects of liberal religion. He proceeded to compare the position of liberal theologians with that of Jesus in regard to the ecclesiastical authorities of his own day. He ventured to believe that the signs of the times were not so pronounced in the direction of liberal religion as might be wished. Rev. A. E. O'CONNOR, B.D., conducted the service.

Mr. E. H. MICKLEWOOD, of Plymouth, presided at the luncheon, held at the Royal Hotel. After the loyal toast, the Chairman gave "Civil and Religious Liberty." He said he understood the toast was a standing one with the Association. In considering the events of history, he was inevitably driven to think that the two things, social liberty and religious liberty, were absolutely indissoluble. There was no instance on record of any nation having one class of liberty without the other. If they sought a modern instance, let them look at Russia. If there was one right people were born into the world with it was the right to follow the dictates of their own consciences. But when he took up his daily paper, as he did last week, and saw columns almost of the names of the most prominent, law-abiding, respectable citizens of Plymouth, who had had their goods seized because of their conscience, he felt more than ever they must keep this fact before them, that "The price of liberty is perpetual vigilance." It was a sacred duty which they owed to their children, to hand down unsullied the rights and privileges which they enjoyed.

Mr. S. W. WRIGHT, Devonport, as vice-chairman, seconded, and extended a hearty welcome to the union on its visit to the Three Towns. He added that, perhaps, there could be no more appropriate time for the visit than the present, as they came to Plymouth to find the mother church joined in partnership with her off-spring at Devonport. Rev. F. W. STANLEY, as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, replied, expressing his pleasure at visiting Plymouth.

The President of the Union, Mr. P. J. WORSLEY, J.P., proposed a vote of thanks for the hospitality afforded the Union, to which Mr. J. Paton (Plymouth) and Mr. G. B. Bryan, D.Sc. (Devonport) replied.

BUSINESS MEETING.

The annual business meeting was afterwards held in the Treville-street chapel.

The annual report stated that during the past year the work of the committee had consisted in the maintenance of the present position of the aided churches, rather than in the breaking of new ground. As a matter of primary importance to the operations of the Union, the committee reported the appointment of Rev. Rudolf Davis, B.A., to the post of district minister, and to the pulpit of Christ Church Chapel, Bridgwater, in succession to the late T B. Broadrick. The committee took the present opportunity of expressing their sincere desire for the success of his labours in the West; nor cou'd they forget Mrs. Broadrick's kind continuance of much real service pending his arrival in the district. The committee recorded with regret the withdrawal of three ministers from their duties during the past year. Rev. G. Leonard Phelps has resigned his post as minister at Christ Church, Devonport, and had been appointed to the ministry of the congregation at Evesham. Rev. J. M. Connell had laid down his duties as junior colleague to the Rev. T. W. Chignell, of Exeter. Rev. J. S. Mathers had also left to take up his abode in Yorkshire. The committee reported the amalgamation of the neighbouring congregations of Plymouth and Devonport, under one minister. Rev. John Belcher had entered upon the duties of that office, with the agreement of the Committee, at the unanimous wish of the members of the two congregations, and at the strong recommendation of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It had been arranged that Mr. Belcher sha'l undertake the services at Plymouth every Sunday morning, and at Devonport in the evening, whilst the morning services at Devonport were sustained by a faithful company of lay preachers, whose helpful services claim hearty recognition. In the last yearly report it was stated that the possible resumption of work at Yeovil had occupied the attention of the committee. Since that time the chapel there, together with the organ, had been put into a good and serviceable condition, through the generous kindness of Mr. H. B. Batten, to whom the committee tendered their most sincere thanks. The amount of aid set forth as necessary for the restoration of Bowden-hill Chapel, Crediton, had been obtained, to the amount of £360. The committee anticipated with hope the settlement of a minister there, as soon as that may be found possible. A debt of hearty thanks was due to the lay preachers, who gave their ofttimes hardly won Sabbath leisure to the service of our scattered churches. The district minister is deeply sensible of this self-sacrificing work, and your committee join with him in thankful recognition of it. From time to time, as on the present occasion, the treasurer was confronted by a serious adverse balance, and supporters of the Union would see how the committee were necessarily, but most unwillingly, compelled to limit that help, which, if only funds permitted, they would most gladly increase in the case of several of the churches; but, again, the record of the year's work must end with a most urgent plea for larger means, which the committee refuse to believe would really be withheld from faithful work in so good a cause.

The Treasurer (Mr. J. KENRICK CHAMPION) presented the financial statement. At the beginning of 1904 there was an adverse balance of £14 17s. 9d., which was generously liquidated by Mr. P. J. Worsley. The total receipts were £366, and the expenses £422, leaving an adverse balance of £56. The Treasurer appealed for increased assistance to reduce the balance.

The Secretary called attention to the excellent work accomplished by the Postal Mission, and paid a tribute to the self-denying work of Miss Barmby, of Sidmouth. He remarked that they had hardly a more useful agency than the Postal Mission in the West of England, and he hoped that friends would come forward and help them in the matter.

A discussion ensued on the report, and the President, commenting on the deficit, pointed out that following on the sad death of the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, of Bridgwater, district minister, a large expense was incurred, which, he hoped, would not be repeated.

Major-General JACOB (Tavistock) viewed with regret the possible reduction of grants to the aided churches, and after further deliberation the report and balance-sheet laid before the Assembly were unanimously adopted, on the motion of Mr. WHITFORD, of Plymouth, seconded by the Rev. F. A. HOMER, of Taunton.

The committee and officers were then appointed, the Rev. John McDowell being the new President; and the Revs. Walter Lloyd and A. E. O'Connor were thanked for their services that morning.

On the motion of the Rev. JOSEPH WAIN, seconded by the Rev. J. FISHER JONES, the Rev. F. W. Stanley was cordially welcomed as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and in reply Mr. Stanley alluded to the great increase in the Association's work during the past few years.

The Rev. J. McDOWELL was appointed as the representative of the Union on the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. S. W. WRIGHT moved that the Union send a recommendation to the churches in the district calling on them to encourage their ministers to take a keen interest in the social, political, and municipal life of the community in which they were placed. Mr. W. Vile seconded, and it was carried.

A vote of thanks to the President for his services during the year was heartily accorded, and Rev. Rudolf Davis was also heartily welcomed.

PUBLIC MEETING AT DEVONPORT.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Temperance Hall, Fore-street, Devonport, presided over by Mr. P. J. WORSLEY, J.P., who was supported by the Revs. A. N. Blatchford, Rudolf Davis, F. W. Stanley, J. McDowell, Walter Lloyd, J. H. Belcher, Dr. G. B. Bryan, Messrs. A. S. Harris, J. G. Norman, S. W. Wright, and others. There was an excellent attendance.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, reminded his audience that the history of the Plymouth congregation was most interesting. The chapel in Treville street was founded in the time of Charles II., very shortly, indeed, after the year 1662, in which the clergy of the Church were called upon to make a declaration under the Act of Uniformity. Their Unitarian Churches stood for a very noble principle, and Plymouth might claim an honourable share in the resistance of the attempt to muzzle those clergy. Their churches locally were not very large nor imposing, but Plymouth people might well be proud of them as examples of what free religious worship should be. They thought it rather hard nowadays, if their opinions did not accord with those of the authorities, that they should be treated as outcasts in society. But what was that compared with the sacrifices of the ministers who left their parsonages and went out into the world to strive for themselves rather than conform with certain doctrines which they could not conscientiously hold. It was not always a fashionable thing to be a Unitarian, but they could feel, especially if they closely read the works of Dr. Martineau, that they had something better than fashion or pleasure behind them in being members of societies that had been brought up in the perfect freedom of those chapels which belonged to the Unitarian and the Free Christian Union.

The Rev. J. McDOWELL, in a stirring address, said he believed that all arrogant egotism was wrong. Behind the thought of all men in ages past and ages present was the great hidden life and power of which all human institutions, all ecclesiasticisms, all dogmatic faith, and all personal intuition were so many manifestations. If they were to cover the whole wide ground of humanity's hope, humanity's aspirations, and humanity's need, they would require to take into their embrace every historic manifestation of the religious conscience, and to accept the best that was in every church and the noblest that was in every soul, in order to find the perfect whole. There was a genuine liberalism and a spurious liberalism in religion. For himself, he liked to look for, and he always found, the grains of truth in every creed. Providence had provided a place for all their churches to-day, but their own church, by its single-hearted service, was making religion more human, and Christianity more practical. The world was beginning to realise that Christ was the elder Brother of them all.

Mr. J. G. NORMAN deplored the fact that religion had led to so many wars, and admitted that many peoples were entitled to look upon religion as a scourge. Alluding to the statement that the Nonconformist Churches as a whole appeared to be farther from their own body than they were fifty years ago, and remarked that that was probably due to modern criticism, which caused the Churches to get away as far as they could from the Unitarians. As Unitarians, their position was not in any way affected by the Biblical criticism, which was exciting such terror in every direction.

The Rev. RUDOLF DAVIS spoke hopefully of the prospect before him as district minister. He said he was told, when thinking of coming into the West, that he must be prepared to find rather a sad state of things amongst their congregations. He had been most pleasantly surprised to find how full of life, and what genuine religious feeling there was in these small isolated country congregations. Such congregations were patterns for other parts of the country, yet he could not help being struck with the fact that there was too much living on what their forefathers had done for God, and not enough realisation of what God had done and was doing for His people to-day.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY remarked that their work was difficult, and did not change. Undoubtedly the brighter days for which their forefathers had hoped would come, but he did not anticipate them in the present generation. In spite of all that was said to the contrary he declared that England and her people did want the higher criticism, and did want to be able to understand the religion she professed. There was a new belief in the Incarnation; but it meant not the divine in a man, but the divine in man. He believed that new yet old doctrine of the divine in humanity was going to regenerate the whole land from end to end.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD and the Rev. J. H. BELCHER also spoke, each emphasing the fundamental points on which Unitarians based their existence as liberal churchmen. Liberalism, said Mr. Belcher, had changed, doubtless, but civil liberty and religious liberty, as they understood it, was the same to-day as ever. Their's was still the liberty to develop in the full sense into free men and women.

The Rev. W. LLOYD also spoke, and then the chairman resigned his position to the Rev. J. McDowell. The new president paid a high tribute to Mr. Worsley's unremitting and generous services to the Union, and moved a vote of thanks to him, which Dr. Bryan seconded, and which was accorded with enthusiasm.

The proceedings of the Assembly closed with a Ministers' Conference on the following morning. It took place at Treville-street, when an excellent paper on "Doctrinal Preaching," read by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, evoked the keen interest of those present, who subsequently departed for their homes cheered and encouraged by the hearty hospitality of the Plymouth and Devonport friends.

THE first number of the new University Review is published this month by Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes, of London and Manchester (6d. net). The Right Hon. James Bryce contributes an Introductory Note, and Sir Oliver Lodge writes on "Questions for Discussion." "Universities and Examinations," by Professor Arthur Schuster; "Shakespeare and Stoicism," by Professor Sonnenschein; and "The Education of the Citizen," by Professor Churton Collins, are the other articles. A feature of the Review is fifty pages of University news. In the June number Canon Barnett will write on University Settlements, and Mr. J. A. Hobson on "The Possibility of Progress."

No man can wear out his power of doing his duty. The discharge of one task strengthens conscience to make a demand still more severe.—H. W. Crosskey.

SPIRITUAL GROWTH.

THOUGH the dawning of religious life in the soul is always a source of joy to the person experiencing it, its growth is mostly attended with some disappointment. Even the earliest movement towards holiness, after it has passed, has some phase of misgiving. We realise that our experience is not like that of others, so we question whether ours is genuine. But surely it must be true that, could we but peep at the working of the spiritual realm behind our individual consciousness, we should be assured that even the slightest inclination towards a better life is of divine inspiration.

No religious experience ever yet sounded the complete depth of spiritual life; and yet every life of such a character has touched truly, though it may be faintly, the great reality of the eternal life of the universe.

Men of science have sometimes hinted that in the present human form we have the culmination of physical creation, the long development from the gaseous, through the mineral, vegetable, and animal worlds, has reached its highest in man. This may be true with regard to the body, but that wonderful body contains still more wonderful powers which have yet a long vista of development before them. The mental and spiritual powers of man may yet have many cycles of evolution to go through. What the future has in store for the human race can only be approximately guessed. We see on every hand attempts to urge forward the best that is in man; and all schemes of reform contain the earnest and promise of future perfection.

No individual thinks he is without the possibility of improvement, though he may try to persuade himself he is the best of all possible creatures. We are usually wise enough not to advertise our self-conceit; but it is not seldom that our bubble is so well blown that we succeed in deceiving ourselves into the belief that it is solid substance. The sorrowful thing is that self-conceit and self-complacency arrest spiritual development. Unless these bubbles are effectually burst, we shall never be other than spiritual dwarfs. Thin though they are, it is not an easy matter to destroy them, because of the superficial beauty of their appearance. The colours of our environment are reflected upon them, and they glint and glow in the bewildering irridesence arising from the customs of society and current thought. It is a beauty which passes muster among our fellows. But with a touch of truth the bubbles must disappear into thin air. They dazzle us only because of our imperfect knowledge. When in the light of eternal truth we see with the seeing eye of the mind a vision of the ideal which the best thought of the ages has been preparing for us, then the grand realities of infinite wisdom, God's love, and the moral beauty of the world, show us the substantial truth as a contrast to the bubble of our own partial development.

Now we see in part; and it is scarcely likely that two people will see the same part. We walk into our gardens on a clear night, and watch the changing sky-pictures; and know that in no other part of the globe the same celestial pictures are seen. But the whole of the heavenly bodies are there in the wonder of their magnitude and the glory of their perfect brightness, though our view of them is such a limited one. We see the bright crescent of the moon, as a simple thin segment, but no intelligent person believes that the thin curve is the entire moon, and that it really changes its shape as the month advances. No one will believe that the moon is cut into thin slices. We know the complete globe is there, though a part of it only is visible. We only see that part on which the sun shines for us.

So with regard to man's consciousness of God, the universe, and truth. Into the perception of any human being there has come only a part of truth, only a part of God, only a phase of eternal light. None have ever known the entire truth, or seen the whole of God. Men could not bear such a resplendant sight. But we should remember that while it is only part, it is part of the whole. Just as we know of the existence of the whole of the moon, when we only see a thin crescent, so we know we have seen a true part of the great God, when we have only been able spiritually to discern the fainest, narrowest streak of his wonderful personality. But what we do see is an earnest of what is to follow. Our spiritual growth depends upon our successive developments of the character of God.

When we have a good desire in the heart we do not doubt its existence, but we know it is not as bright and true as it should be. We admit the hunger after heart purity and the thirst for sweetness in life, and the yearning after nobility of character, but we also admit how poor our realised attempts at these have been. What is this consciousness? Is it not the realisation that there is far more in the spiritual life we feel within us than we have allowed to be revealed? Some look at us and are glad that we are as good as we are; but we know how poor that goodness is. This is the dawning of the truth that ours is but the thin crescent of light, indicating that there is much more still hid in shadow. Humility will not allow us to admit it, but we feel persuaded that our desire is to be like Christ—to fulfil the highest possible destiny of humanity—to realise the ideal of man.

Now this is not an isolated impulse, nor a separated yearning, but a true part of the spirit of God asserting itself through the infinite depths of thought, knowledge, and feeling, revealing itself on the edge of personal consciousness. Wherever the desire for better life and higher experience is felt, whether it be in the home of a saintly woman, the cell of an emaciated ascetic, or the cave of a crude savage, it is part of the whole spiritual life of the universe, for God cannot be divided, nor spirit separated. In however many phases it presents itself, in essence it is one. Every good deed, every noble impulse, every kind thought belong inseparably to the great spirit of God. They are manifestations of God in the realms of human consciousness.

As we advance, therefore, in spiritual growth our development is seen in that God can speak more definitely through us. This growth takes place in proportion to our willingness to let the divine will shape our lives. We have to realise that we may render ourselves pliable to God's moulding, and then be prepared to be used for the utterance of some part of His great truth by our life and speech. Thus we must avoid stifling the good impulses, remembering that behind them there is the force of Infinite Spirit. We have been warned against quenching the spirit; but we ask ourselves whether we can effectually hinder that spirit working in us. Can the puny power of finite creatures quench the spirit of the Infinite God? It can arrest the progress of spiritual growth in the soul, for the divine Spirit only works in harmony with the human will. Our yielding to its influence must be willing yielding, or the spiritual must retire. The secret and force of spiritual growth, then, is the realisation that every good impulse and desire is the universal ideal seeking to manifest itself in the reality of our lives. It is the Infinite good on its way from the invisible realms of the spirit into the seen, God seeking to manifest Himself in the flesh, the hidden potentiality of spiritual life agitating the emotions to secure a revelation in human life. Spiritual growth takes place just as we allow this inner power to have its way first in our thoughts and then in our deeds.

LUCKING TAVENER.

ABRAHAM AND THE STRANGER.

SOMEWHERE I've heard how Abram's open door
No stranger entered for a week or more,
Whereat the kindly Patriarch wondered sore,

Forth fared he from the tent in much amaze,
And, to the utmost verge of sun-bright haze,
Searched the dim distance with a wistful gaze—

When, lo, an old man, like a willow bent,
Halting and slow, approached the open tent,
And forth to meet him Abram gladly went;

And, as his wont was, welcomed him with zest,
Saying: "O weary pilgrim! be my guest;
Honour my dwelling; grace my simple feast."

Consent is gladly given. Servants haste,
And soon before them smokes a good repast.
Yet, ere the Patriarch and his servants taste,

A solemn grace of thankfulness is paid
To God, and suitable responses made.
But silent sits the guest with unbowed head.

And Abram thus: "O man of ancient days!
Art thou indeed a stranger to our ways?
Is it not seemly ere one eats to praise?"

To which the man replied: "I worship Fire."
Whereat the Patriarch rose in furious ire
And hotly bade him from the tent retire.

When, lo, an angel of the Lord appears:
And thus rebukes the hasty Patriarch:
"Say! of day
Has but one single hour of one away?
Worn all thy patience, Abraham, hundred
Yet I have borne with him years."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Ashton-under-Lyne (Appointment).—Rev. H. Kelsey White, of Urmston, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit of the Richmond-hill Unitarian Church, and is to commence his ministry on June 4.

Bradford.—Large congregations assembled at Chapel-lane Chapel on Sunday, on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the ministry of the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones in Bradford. In the morning Mr. Jones preached from the words: "I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God" (Acts xx. 27), and gave an outline of his teaching during the past twenty years. The title of his evening discourse was: "Leaves from a Minister's Diary," in which he reviewed the main features of his ministry. Mr. Jones said that as he looked back upon the time he had spent with his devoted people his feelings were those of profound gratitude. His experience as a minister had been such that if he had his life to live over again he would still choose the ministry as his most congenial vocation. He did not think there was any vocation that could bring a man so much true and lasting happiness as that of a minister of a Free Church, who was allowed to declare to his people the whole counsel of God as he understood it. His life had been like one long summer day, in which sunshine had largely predominated. During his ministry great changes had taken place. He had officiated at the interment of about four hundred adults, most of whom had had some connection with the congregation. Among them there had been those who had been the salt of the earth—men and women of high principle, who honoured their profession by the sanctity of their lives. For all the churches the past twenty years had been a time of trial and difficulty, because a wave of excitement and pleasure-seeking had been passing over the country, and not a few had been carried away by it from the best influences. He was, however, persuaded that this was only a passing mood which would soon give place in increased zeal and earnestness. Men and women would see that if they meant to preserve the sanctities of home life and give their children a chance of growing up to noble manhood and womanhood, they must keep in closest touch with religious culture. Another influence had been steadily at work—the broadening spirit of their time, which had been gradually undermining mediæval theology. The religious atmosphere was very different now from what it was twenty years ago. The old ideas of an angry God, an eternal hell, and salvation by faith were passing away, and a simpler form of religion, which might be defined as love to God as their Father and love to man as their brother, was gaining ground. During the past twenty years they had done much to improve their religious home, and both their church and schools were now worthy of the great principles for which they stood. Much attention has also been given to the musical part of their services, which they had found increasingly helpful. It was fitting that their faith should be aided by the most touching and pathetic of all the arts—the art of music. One pleasing feature of their church was that it was largely a congregation of earnest and intelligent young people, who there received a good training for the duties of useful citizenship. During the past twenty years they had had a fine succession of faithful workers, but never a better staff than at the present time. He had confidence that in the future, as in the past, they would unite with him in every earnest effort to carry out the beautiful ideals of their faith, so that they might help to make the city of Bradford more like the city of God.

Bristol.—Lewin's Mead was beautifully decorated with flowers for the Sunday-school anniversary services held last Sunday. Between two and five hundred children's voices joined in the music hymns which had been set to special tunes by Mr. David Churchill, and large congregations took part in the services. The Rev. A. N. Blatch addressed the children both morning and evening. Next Sunday the children will sing the hymns again at Oakfield-road church, when the services will be conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter.

Colne.—On May 7 the chapel anniversary services were held. The Rev. John Evans, B.A., who commenced duties as settled minister, preached two excellent sermons to good congregations. At the morning service he gave a most instructive and helpful address to scholars and friends. On May 13 the "Welcome" tea and meeting was held. Over 200 partook of tea, including friends from Bolton, Burnley, Padiham, and Nelson. The meeting was held in the chapel, which was well filled, presided over by Mr. R. Duerden. Mr. J. W. Hird welcomed Mr. Evans on behalf of the congregation, and Miss M. A. Mann on behalf of the Sunday-school. The Rev. C. J. Street (Sheffield) congratulated them on securing Mr. Evans as their minister. In him they would find one who had a high ideal, and who would strive hard to translate his ideal into the real. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, after speaking of the affectionate regard they had for Mr. Evans in Bolton, and the excellent work he had done at Halliwell-road, said the time had now come for Unitarians to leave the controversial and to address themselves more and more to the constructive side of their religious faith. He pleaded for the upbuilding of a strong spiritual church. Mr. Thomas Harwood and Mr. J. Bullough both spoke of Mr. Evans's good work at Bolton. The Revs. R. T. Herford, T. Leyland, R. McGee, J. J. Shaw, J. Thomas, J. E. Jenkins, J. M. Whiteman, E. Allen, and W. H. Burgess also heartily joined in the welcome.

Halifax.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held at Northgate End chapel on Sunday, May 14, when the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, preached morning and evening. There was a service of song in the afternoon, entitled "James Martineau," suggested by the centenary. This was compiled and read by the Rev. F. E. Millson. Special music was sung at all the services by the choir and the scholars under the direction of Mr. Arthur Wilson. In connection with the anniversary the Rev. P. E. Richards read selections from Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" on Monday evening in the chapel. The collections at the services and reading were £23 7s. 3½d.

Heywood.—On Sunday last the annual Sunday-school services were held, being conducted by the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, of Chesterfield. Special hymns and anthems were admirably rendered by the choir, augmented for the occasion by the children and elder scholars to about 100. On both occasions the chapel was crowded and the services were most helpful and inspiring. The offertories for the day amounted to over £55. Next year the congregation will celebrate the jubilee of the founding of their church.

Llandyssul Sunday School Union.—The annual Gymanfa of the Bwlch, Llwyn, Pantdefaid, and Graig, Llandyssul, Sunday-schools was held at the latter place on Sunday last. Glorious weather favoured the meeting, with the result that the chapel could not nearly hold the congregation. The different schools recited portions of Scriptures and were catechised in the same by the Revs. T. Arthur Thomas and E. O. Jenkins. A special feature of the meeting was the united singing conducted by Mr. David Jones, Rhydyfeul, and accompanied by Miss James, Brynhyfryd. In the evening two powerful sermons were delivered by Mr. James Davies, Pencadr School, and the Rev. E. O. Jenkins. A special programme of music was rendered by the choir.

London: Islington.—On Wednesday, May 10, in connection with the Unity Church Young People's Society, a performance of Clementine Ward's Japanese operetta "Ju-Ju; or, the Golden Amulet," was given in the schoolroom and was a great success.

London: Peckham.—A very successful social meeting was held in the Avondale-road schoolroom on Wednesday evening, the 10th inst. Seventy-five members and friends were present at the invitation of the Church Committee to meet the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher, who has occupied the pulpit for the past two months. Already there are signs of increased vitality. The attendance at the services has considerably increased. Mr. Fletcher's sermons are much appreciated, and one of the members has had 1,000 copies of his Easter morning sermon printed and freely distributed, the subject being "Was the sepulchre empty?" It was decided to form a Church Guild, and much enthusiasm was exhibited.

London: Plumstead.—The bazaar committee desire to express their deep gratitude and thanks for the kind sympathy and assistance rendered by all friends to the recent bazaar held at the Unitarian Hall in aid of the Church Building Fund. A balance in hand of £120 was realised by the occasion, a result with which the congregation is highly pleased, and stimulated to further efforts to attain the object in view.

Middlesbrough.—On Sunday, May 14, the anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street, his evening subject being "The Work Lying Ready to the Hands of Unitarians." On Monday the Spring Conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association was held, and was well attended by representatives from the neighbouring towns. Mr. W. J. Watson (Thornaby) presided over the afternoon meeting, to hear the Rev. W. H. Lambelle read a paper "Is It Wise to Employ Revival Methods in the Unitarian Church?" The discussion was opened by Rev. G. A. Fergusson, of Gateshead, the Revs. F. Wood, and J. C. Street also taking part. Afterwards tea was served in the schoolroom, followed by a conversazione. Short addresses were given with music at intervals. The whole of the meetings were helpful and successful in every sense.

Norwich.—The Rev. Alfred Hall preached a forcible sermon at the Octagon Chapel on Sunday evening on "The Bishop of Norwich and the Athanasian Creed," to which the Eastern Daily Press devoted nearly a column of a good report.

Shrewsbury.—At the close of the evening service on Sunday last Mr. Harry J. Mansell, a member of the church and choir, and a teacher in the Sunday-school, being about to leave Shrewsbury for Canada, was presented with a travelling chest and a substantial sum of money, spontaneously subscribed by some seventy or eighty contributors. The little ceremony, which took place immediately after the sermon, was of an extremely interesting and impressive character, made all the more touching by the beautiful address delivered by Mrs. Myers in making the presentation. She told how Mr. Mansell had become a scholar in the school fifteen years ago, and had always been a help and not a hindrance, as he grew up, and at last became a teacher. They would miss him very much, she said, but his good influence in the school would remain. S. Longfellow's hymn, "Go forth to life, O child of earth" was sung immediately after the presentation.

Unitarian Home Missionary College.—Meetings in connection with the Jubilee Fund were held in Liverpool on Monday last. The Congregational hall of the Ancient Chapel was the scene of the afternoon meeting, and in the enforced absence of Mr. Philip Holt, the Rev. C. Craddock took the chair. Addresses were delivered by Colonel Pilcher, the Revs. J. E. Manning and C. Peach, and a vote of sympathy with the aims of the College was passed on the motion of the Rev. H. D. Roberts. In the evening of the same day a meeting was held in the Congregational Hall of the Hope-street Church. Alderman Bowring, who presided, expressed his sympathy with the work of the College and his intention to subscribe to the fund. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. C. C. Coe (president), Colonel Pilcher (chairman), Mr. F. W. Monks (vice-chairman), the Revs. J. E. Manning, C. Peach, and Mr. R. Robinson. A vote of thanks was passed on the motion of the Revs. J. C. Odgers and J. C. Hirst. Mr. Odgers confessed his conversion to the Jubilee scheme after some early doubts. He was now convinced that the scheme was a wise one, and the work of the College absolutely necessary to the northern churches.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE seems every likelihood of a large demand for tickets for the Essex Hall lecture on Tuesday, June 13, when Professor Henry Jones will take as his subject "The Immortality of the Soul in Browning and Tennyson." Subscribers to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are each entitled to a non-transferable ticket, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is sent to the Secretary not later than June 6. Relying on the probabi ity that a large proportion of the members of the Association will be unable to attend, owing to distance and other causes, non-members will have an opportunity of procuring tickets for one shilling. Applications from members and non-members alike should be sent to Essex Hall with as little delay as possible.

THE National Unitarian Temperance Association conducted a successful meeting at the Royal Victoria Hall, Waterloo-road, on Friday evening, May 19. Fully four hundred were present, and a stirring address was given by the Chairman, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who was followed by the Mayor of Woolwich (the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones), and Mr. Richard Montford, of the United Kingdom Alliance. Solos and glees by the choir of the Stamford-street Temperance Society were interspersed, and a vote of thanks to them and to the speakers, on the motion of Dr. Herbert Smith, seconded Mr. H. G. Chancellor, was cordially passed. The meeting unanimously adopted a petition in favour of the earlier closing of public-houses.

How rapidly the old forms of religious individualism are breaking down as they are brought face to face with the involved conditions of modern town life. There are, for instance, fifty Congregational churches in Manchester-Salford. Each of these has its own peculiar sphere and interests. But the members of all of them have recognised a common interest in their vast mäelstrom of industry. They have formed a board representing all the units of church life for co-operation in the discharge of their larger common responsibility. In a word, they regard the whole city, with its suburbs, as their parish. The churches are fifty, but the city is one. One plan they have adopted which has long been familiar to us, viz., the appointment of a minister at-large.

AMONG their many experiments they record some failures. Thus they have been unable to induce their young people to sit for examinations in church history. But success has attended the effort to found or support settlement work. They have also demonstrated the possibility, given certain qualifications, of reaching the working clas es. A small Salford congregation started a P.S.A. in a neighbouring assembly room. Out of this grew an evening congregation of 700 people. The little church could not cope with the task. The board came to its assistance with the appointment of a second minister. And so on.

THE Manchester Board is one of several similar ones in great towns of the north. Representatives of the different Boards meet in council from time to time to discuss matters of general concern, and to compare experiences. And these gatherings seem a step in the direction of some real federation of the City Boards of Churches. Such a development goes far to explain the rapid change of thought which is taking place. The towns as units have their own solidarity. There is an analogue here of the structure of local government. We have our County Councils, but County Boroughs are so far individuals, we might almost say, persons, as to demand a separate existence and functioning. So, too, they have Congregational Unions and County Unions. There are also these City Boards, which, while they are more or less without official recognition, are bound to modify the structure of this group of the Free Churches, and serve to explain the gradual disuse of the older word Independent, and the general adoption of the newer title Congregational.

WE note the advance in thought on the "religious difficulty" shown in the editorial note in the Examiner on Secular Education. "There is no doubt that the "secular solution is growing in favour. ". . . It must be remembered, too, that "the only logical position for Nonconfor- "mists to take up is that no religious "teaching shall be given by or paid for "by the State. . . . We wish that our "fellow Free Churchmen had the courage "of their convictions and would work "together for the principle that the State "should not give religious teaching. That "granted, then our churches may do all "that they can to supply the need."

ON Monday afternoon Mr. Choate unveiled the window which he has given to St. Saviour's Collegiate Church, Southwark, in memory of the founder of Harvard University. The window represents the baptism of Christ by John the Baptist, and bears the arms of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and Harvard College. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop-Designate of Southwark, the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Mr. James Bryce were among those present.

Mr. Choate said he had presented the memorial from a desire to signalise his long residence in London by an appropriate gift, which should be in itself emblematical of the deep-seated and abiding relations of friendship which united England and the United States. As a loyal son of Harvard he thought nothing could be more fitting than a permanent memorial of the principal founder of Harvard University. John Harvard was born in that borough, close to the end of London Bridge, and was baptized in that venerable church in 1607. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he spent eight years. Seeking larger freedom of thought than could be found in the London of that day, he emigrated to Massachussets, where he died within two years of his arrival, prematurely, as it seemed, but in the fulness and perfection of time, as was now manifest. Finding the infant colony without means to establish a college in the wilderness in the first decade of their settlement, he bequeathed to its foundation his library and the half of his fortune, which amounted in all to about £1,700. Now, after the lapse of three centuries, that little college in the pathless wilderness had become a great and splendid University—great in prestige and renown, rich in endowment, and richer still in the loyal fidelity of its sons: Unknown and of little account when he sailed from England, John Harvard had been a benefactor to the New World, and his generous and timely gift had borne fruit a million-fold. He hoped that memorial would long remain, in order that Americans might come to see the very spot where one of their proudest institutions had its origin, and that it might remind Englishmen who visited it how inseparable were the two nations in their history and in their destiny

THE Martineau Centenary was celebrated by the Christian Register in a number of articles, three of which appeared on April 20, by the Revs. J. T. Sunderland, John Cuckson, and A. Lazenby. Mr. Cuckson's article on "James Martineau as Teacher" was the most notable. Then, on April 27, there was an article by the Rev. A. W. Jackson on "Martineau's Religious Philosophy," and on May 11 an article of very interesting reminiscences by Dr. Edward Everett Hale. In this, Martineau's colleague should have been not "Dr. Taylor," but the Rev. John James Tayler. Dr. Hale prints the following letter he received from Dr. Martineau in response to greetings on his 90th birthday :—

"Could I have followed the order of "choice instead of being driven into that "of necessity, you would have been "among the first rather than among the "the last to receive my heartfelt thanks "for the birthday congratulations and "good wishes which greeted me a month "ago. But the copies of the Christian "Register which you kindly forwarded "to me will explain how prolonged "a task has been presented to my "pen by the profuse and generous "affection of my friends. The multitude "of benedictions, however, does not "cheapen the value of any one; and most "assuredly not that of yours and your "good sister's, both of which I prize and "gratefully lay by among my stores for "my children's sake. Your sister's letter "to me touches me very deeply, too deeply, "indeed, for any answering words— "which always seem to wrong the inner "life and becloud its sacredness. I am "truly grateful if, in speaking out of my "own heart in a 'Home Prayer,' I have "uttered here and there what is true also "to an experience like hers. Only, I "believe, by such simple self-confession "do we reach the ultimate ground of "union between the human soul and the "Father of spirits.

"Not, however, that we can afford to "part with the objective help of historical religion, embodied in a supreme "personality, realising the ideal relation "between man and God, for reverence "and veneration needing a definite outward direction for sustained and growing "life. Hence, I cannot but cling to the "Christian type of Theism and distrust "the relapse, now exemplified both here "and with you, into the old 'Natural "'Religion' and the supposed 'advance,' "but real retrogradation into 'Ethical "'Societies.' These may doubtless furnish "edifying combinations and discussion "clubs, helpful to individuals; but they "have not the conditions of permanent "union, expressing as they do transitional "states of mind, either abstract, unsecured upon the concrete, or rudimentary, "stopping short of its crown, like a "staircase leading nowhither. Meanwhile "they may help to dispense with ecclesi-"astical superfluities."

THE May number of Sermons for the Day contains a sermon on "The Forgiveness of Sins," preached by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong in January, 1903. Its burden may be seen in the following passage:—

"So the true forgiveness of sin, it would "seem, can come only to such as, with "an awakened hatred of their sin, wrestle "with it to put it far from them, and "yearn for re-union with God,—or with "all that world of goodness and purity "and holiness, which stands to them for "God. The agnostic, too, no less than "the repeater of Christian creeds, knows "the difference between an inner sense of "oneness with all that is sweet and true "and beautiful in the spiritual world, and "a sense of being shut up in an outer "darkness without inward fellowship with "things lovely and of good report. And he "too may struggle back, through humility "and love, to that harmony with the "spiritual world, which in the Christian "vocabulary is called 'forgiveness.' But "to him whom it is given to have some "glimmering of the Living God, to know, "by deep experiences of the soul, that "we have a Heavenly Father, the call "back to the life of forgiveness will be "clearer and stronger, and the cords "that draw him back towards peace and "concord will draw with a more compelling power.

"And so we come to see the absolute "inevitableness of that ultimatum: "'except ye forgive men their trespasses "against you, neither will your Heavenly "Father forgive you your trespasses.' "Indeed, it is not necessary to say that "He will not; for, in the very nature of "the problem, He cannot. The All-holy "cannot decree harmony between Himself "and one in whom still lurks the temper "of hate, or vengeance, or evil grudge "Omnipotence itself cannot harmonise "good and evil, make the impure and the "pure to be at one."

GREAT interest is being manifested, Mr. W. H. Shrubsole informs us, with regard to the projected Polytechnic tour in Hungary, and reception committees are being formed at Budapest, Karsa, Eperjes, Debreczen, and elsewhere. Several village festivals will be among the arrangements in honour of the visitors. His Excellency the Royal Hungarian Finance Minister has invited the party to visit the world-famous opal mine, and will send carriages to fetch them from Eperjes, 15 miles distant. At the mine there will be an official reception. In order to avoid the inconvenience of changing carriages at the frontier, special carriages will be sent from Hungary to Berlin, to convey the British visitors directly onward, via Oderburg, to the magnificent Carpathian region.

MANY friends will be glad to hear that we have received a capital report from the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who is at Tresco, Scilly, enjoying the sunshine and the glorious sea, with summer in May, and the restfulness of primitive surroundings.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD.

The holiest saint of God knows nothing more than is contained in the words: "Our Father, who art in Heaven."

JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

IT has seemed to me, sometimes, as if one special mission of Unitarianism was to quicken in the modern world a realisation of the Fatherhood of God. The truth, of course, has been known from the earliest times to great and loving souls. The Old Testament pages glow here and there with thoughts of the love of the Almighty and Eternal God as a Father. It is depicted as the tenderest, the most supporting, that the heart can feel or the mind conceive. And this was the faith perfected in the life and teaching of Jesus. But other thoughts have been allowed to intervene in the teaching of the Church—thoughts of fear and of hopeless alienation. Modern Protestantism has struggled but slowly, through the besetments of Calvinism, towards the apprehension of the love of God as a Father. An "orthodox" friend of mine remembers distinctly the glad surprise with which she first heard that God loved everybody and loved them all the time. She had been brought up to believe that He loved "good" people and loved her only "when she was good."

Yet from of old there have been those who knew Him better than that, and felt in His love all the tenderness of the deepest mother-love. "Can a woman forget her sucking child that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb?" His prophet pleads with Israel. "Yea" (for the love of God is beyond all comparison for endurance, as for everything else), "Yea, these may forget, yet will not I forget thee. Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of My hands." "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. For He knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust." And Jesus makes very clear to us the wonderful tenderness of the Father's love, the constant care of Infinite God for each individual human being.

Now, what part does this wonderful truth play in our daily life? What does it mean to us, as we lay down this copy of the INQUIRER and return to our sewing, our office, our wash-tub, or our bench? What does it mean to us morning by morning as the grey light struggles in upon us, rousing to labour and anxiety; evening by evening as we drop our unfinished work reluctantly from tired hands? It is a truth so simply stated.

God is my Father.

The high and holy One who inhabiteth eternity loves me as a Father should love his child—and a helpless child. He loves me with a depth and fulness beyond the most compassionate mother-love; with a tender infinite knowledge of me, my frailties, my joys, my aspirations, my difficulties, such as no earthly father ever had. And what of it? What is the worth of the fact to you and me? Well, for one thing, we partake of God's nature. Therefore, it is in us to become daily more like God. We can get to know Him better and to love Him more. In His power we can strive to cast out of our souls and our characters the things which are unlike God, which dishonour and grieve Him, and we can build up in ourselves the things that are lovely, pure, and of good report. As we accept God's will in all things our own wills, now so perverse, shall become trained and disciplined till we become partakers of the holiness of our Father in heaven; for "More than our feeble souls can pine

For holiness,
That Father, in His tenderness divine,
Yearneth to bless."

And surely the thought of this relationship banishes fear? A friend sends me this little story told recently by an author:—When a child he was taken terribly sleepy in church. With all his might he tried to keep his little eyes open. He sat stiffly upright, a prey to fear and pain, dreading a tumble, a scolding, a public disgrace as only a sensitive child can. At length he saw through a mist his father looking at him, and, before he knew what had happened, he found himself lifted up and lying in the kind, strong fatherly arms, lapped in exquisite repose and absolute relief from fear.

Is it our circumstances which give cause (as we say) for anxiety? Is it thoughts of the future? Do we worry about the children and their development? Are we letting the joys of life come to us and carry us on their tide without thought of the Giver of all true joy? Do we chafe against the multitudinous nagging little things which prevent wide reading or congenial public work? Is it ourselves which are our greatest trouble? Let us search out the daily trial and the daily failure of our lives and state it to ourselves in plain, honest, untheological English, and then say: "My Father, God, all-powerful, so that to change my circumstances were easy to Thee; all-wise, so that Thou knowest me altogether, and knowest if a change were best for me; all-loving, so that my interests are unutterably dear to Thy fatherly heart; I trust Thee all-in-all and for all." Say it (or words expressing such ideas) over to yourself quietly, meaning them, and see whether the light of God does not shine into and warm your whole soul, showing you that He is caring, planning, working for you; that the children are His children; that joys are made sacred by being His gift; and that "all things are yours, for ye are Christ's and Christ is God's." My space is gone, and my theme is inexhaustible. Indeed, I had not dared to touch such a theme at all but that Mr. Armstrong's lectures last November made so deep an impression on me, and revived within me such a sense of the nearness and love of the Almighty Father that I have longed to bring home to others, if I could, something of the same feeling. Faith in this immortal, unquenchable love is our only hope. But it is all-sufficient,

"For neither life, nor death, nor things below,
Nor things above
Shall ever sever us that we should go
From His great love."

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

THE flavour of humour like that of sermons soon grows stale. Even at its best it is strictly occasional. It suits the whim of the moment, or it gives zest and point to the controversy which has now sunk into its secular sleep. It is little short of a triumph when a witty saying or a masterpiece of ridicule survives, like Sydney Smith's famous apologue of Mrs. Partington and the Atlantic Ocean. But there are wits whose fame has become classical. It is remembered to their credit that they knew how to make people laugh, and to use laughter for great ends. Sydney Smith belongs to this select number, and a new life of him by Mr. G. W. E. Russell in the "English Men of Letters" is very welcome. It is hardly worth while to call in question the right of the brilliant essayist and pamphleteer to a place among the immortals. The book is full of interest and gaiety; it recalls a figure which has grown dim for a new generation; we are satisfied without any discussion of relative values.

Mr. Russell's sketch of two hundred pages is something more than a study of Sydney Smith, the humourist. It tells the story of his life and of the great controversies for freedom and reform in which he was engaged, and the wit is introduced, as it should be, in all the piquancy of its natural situation. An anthology of witticisms held together by a slender thread of biography would have been a dreary performance; but Mr. Russell has too much humour himself to be tempted in that way. For Sydney Smith the man it is perhaps difficult to feel all the enthusiasm of his biographer. There is a great deal in his character which stirs us to admiration and even to strong liking, but there are limits to our sympathy. He was a Whig, and the true Whig is as extinct as the dodo. He opposed the Ballot Act, nor are all for the ballot nowadays. He was a clerical jester and diner-out, and there are some people who would like his jokes and his good dinners better if they could forget his profession. This may be the prejudice of a generation which has forgotten how to be serious and witty at the same time, and it must not be supposed that Sydney Smith was without many exemplary clerical virtues. He cared for his flock with true diligence, and he spoke boldly from the pulpit without fear or favour, and he bore poverty cheerfully. "As long as I can possibly avoid it I will never be unhappy," he wrote to Lady Holland from the banishment of his country living. All this should make us indulgent to the frank satisfaction with which he announces that he has got "a snug thing . . . with full £2,000 a year."

Sydney Smith was all for common sense and a rational religion and freedom of conscience: "no chains, no prisons, no bonfires for a man's faith; and, above all, no modern chains and prisons under the names of disqualifications and incapacities, which are only the cruelty and tyranny of a more civilised age; civil offices open to all, a Catholic or Protestant alderman, a Moravian or a Church of England or a Wesleyan justice, no oppression, no tyranny in belief; a free altar, an open road to heaven; no human insolence, no human narrowness, hallowed by the name of God." Unfortunately, he combined with this admirable breadth a genuine hatred of "enthusiasm" and forms of religion, which he would not restrain by law, he was quite prepared to try to kill by ridicule. He was particularly hostile to Methodists—he spoke of them on one occasion as "a nest of consecrated cobblers"—and to foreign missionaries with their strange passion for spreading the Gospel among savages. These are unpleasant traits which his biographer makes no attempts to extenuate or defend. He calls him frankly a Philistine. The only thing to be said is that it is a form of Philistinism which was much commoner in his day than in our own, and it infected many minds otherwise wholly generous and liberal. Possibly we, too, have our ways of being unpleasant, and the future will judge us or pity us in its own fashion. The greatness of Sydney Smith's mind and his keenness as a political thinker are seen at their best in the part which he played in the agitation for Catholic Emancipation. The letters of Peter Plymley, from which Mr. Russell makes copious extracts, are not only brilliant and racy, but in their grasp of principle and their political foresight they are often comparable to Burke. Many of the worst abuses of the Protestant ascendency in Ireland, to which he referred in such scathing terms, have been reformed; but his pleas for conciliation and the sympathy born of friendship, in the interest no less of political wisdom than of political justice, have lost none of their meaning for an imperial race. "How easy it is," he exclaims, "to shed human blood! How easy it is to persuade ourselves that it is our duty to do so, and that the decision has cost us a severe struggle! How much in all ages have wounds and shrieks and tears been the cheap and vulgar resources of the rulers of mankind! How difficult it is to govern in kindness, and to found an empire upon the everlasting basis of justice and affection!" We have to thank Mr. Russell for a book which will do something more than amuse by its gaiety. It is a contribution of real value to a just appreciation of Sydney Smith as a thinker and reformer at a critical period of English history. As a purveyor of witty speech, his fame has long been secure and his very name has become almost proverbial.

Among other new books that I have noticed recently I may mention a shilling re-issue of "Ireland in the New Century," with an epilogue in answer to his critics, by Sir Horace Plunkett. Regarded simply as a sociological study by a shrewd observer, it is a book of much interest and importance. It is, moreover, that very rare product, a non-party book about Ireland. The author tells us in the preface to the new edition that a Roman Catholic priest informed him that at a recent clerical meeting the minority who had read the book expressed themselves as agreeably surprised, while the majority, who only knew it by hearsay, were strong in disapproval. This is the common fate of a writer who puts his hand to a thorny subject with a single eye to facts and remedies. Sir Horace Plunkett may be wrong in many of his theories and proposals; if so, closer observation will prove him so; but of his candour and sincerity there can be no doubt, nor of the value of what he has written on a basis of wide personal knowledge and dispassionate reflection. His book should be read widely with sympathy and an open mind. This is a tribute of respect which every candid and well-written book has a right to expect. It may even suggest the strange possibility of studying the Irish problem, of expressing sympathy with living Irishmen of all sorts and conditions without any suspicion of political temper.

The detractor often follows close upon the heels of the enthusiast. Only praise and admire a writer enough, and somebody is certain to rise up to denounce him, and to start a fashion of disparagement. Robert Louis Stevenson has not escaped altogether from this fate. There are certain high persons who are fond of speaking of him as a poseur, and a poseur in their language means one who shows his lack of genius by taking trouble with his art. This always reminds me of the people who talk of ordered life and an organised church as though it were the negation of religion. The retort is tempting that some religion is too feeble to be organised, and some literary gifts are too trivial for style and expression to be worth troubling about. But this is a digression, and I mention Stevenson in order to call attention to the delightful sketch of him in Andrew Lang's "Adventures among Books." In its frankness and geniality it will surely disarm the most Spartan of critics. If it does not he must simply be written down as inaccessible to the temptations of good humour.

But if you read the Stevenson essay you will soon be deep in the other good things which the book contains, and especially the chapter of early literary autobiography which gives it its title. Here you may read of the books of Andrew Lang's childhood, of his early struggles with Greek, of his life-long passion for fairy tales, of the way in which the Calvinism of his Scottish birth and training ran from him like water off a duck's back, and many other things equally fascinating. "I confess to having learned the classical languages, as it were, by accident, for the sake of what is in them, and with a provokingly imperfect accuracy." What a delightful confession for the translator of Homer and Theocritus! It is all that one wants to say to the pedants, to whom an obscure word or a doubtful reading brings more excitement than the shout of battle. After all, Homer and Thucydides and Virgil, and (let it be confessed with bated breath) even Amos and Isaiah and the Book of Job, were not written for professional scholars and commentators, but for ordinary men, to urge them to noble thought and action, or to give them the joy of great literature. One other sentence is irresistible, and with it I must really call halt to my rambling pen, lest it betray me into worse indiscretions than railing at dull pedantry. Here it is—let others besides young men apply it to themselves: "Young men, especially in "America, write to me and ask me to "recommend 'a course of reading.' Dis- "trust a course of reading! People who "really care for books read all of them. "There is no other course. Let this be a "reply. No other answer shall they get "from me, the inquiring young men."

MR. CARPENTER'S "MARTINEAU."*

"THIS book," says Mr. Carpenter, in the preface, "has been written at the invitation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to describe the life and work of Dr. Martineau in briefer compass than was possible to his first biographers." But turning over the nearly six hundred pages of this substantial volume, and noting how much of the matter is put into painfully small type (painful, at any rate, to tired eyes), we see how the author's conscientious thoroughness and eagerness to do justice to his great subject has far out-run the first intention of the book. "Briefer," comparatively, one may say it is; positively one cannot say that it is brief. A popular study of James Martineau in the English Men of Letters series has still to be written; for if Jeremy Taylor fitly takes an honourable place in that series, why not Martineau?

We do not complain in the least that Mr. Carpenter's book is not briefer, though for popular purposes, regarding both its price and size, it would then have reached a much wider circle; we are thankful for every word, and can only admire the thoroughness with which the work has been done. But we do complain that so many of the extracts from letters, and sometimes quite long letters, are printed in the small type, which seems to be fitting only for the footnotes; and we complain also that the book has no index. Even the fullest table of contents cannot make good this latter defect, and as to the small type, while it was, no doubt, inevitable, if the matter was to be got into a single volume, the larger type in which a good many of the longer letters are printed serves to show how much easier the reading might have been made.

Turning now to the substance of the book we have, as we have said, only gratitude and admiration to record. The book is a noble centenary tribute, rich in the new material which it has gathered up; true, as it was sure to be, in its insight and its sympathetic touch; and illuminating in its study of the conditions of life and thought in the midst of which the Teacher grew up and did his incomparable work. We referred a fortnight ago to the elaborate chapter on "Religion and Philosophy in England, 1805–1832." Another chapter tells of the progress of church life among Unitarians, of their inheritance from the old English Presbyterians, and how the experience of the Lady Hewley suit and subsequent events helped to mature Dr. Martineau's thought and to confirm his ideal of religious fellowship. In this connection Mr. Carpenter furnishes some most welcome passages from a notable speech made at the Aggregate Meeting of Unitarians in Essex-street Chapel, in 1838, taken from the full report in the Christian Reformer; and throughout the book we find repeated references to old volumes of the Reformer and THE INQUIRER, which are of the greatest service, in directing us to valuable reports of speeches, such as those made at Domestic Mission annual meetings, at the induction of ministers, and at those annual soirées in Liverpool, at which Dr. Martineau spoke again to his old friends after his removal to London. These should by no means be lost sight of.

Other chapters of the study deal with the "Foundations of Philosophy, 1840-1849," and "Theology and Philosophy in the New Unitarianism, 1849-1857," while the story of the Life steadily proceeds; and then, after a brief record of the closing years, there is a final chapter on "The Philosophy of Religion," which contains a sketch of Dr. Martineau's mature thought as embodied in his three great works, the "Types of Ethical Theory," the "Study of Religion," and "The Seat of Authority in Religion," published in 1885, 1888, and 1890 respectively.

"Such was the faith," says Mr. Carpenter at the conclusion of this study, "which the Teacher had won from the manifold experience of a strenuous career. Among the English theologians of the nineteenth century none had covered so wide a range; none possessed so varied a knowledge; none had more completely blended the highest efforts of speculation with graces of character or the trusts of a lowly heart." And again: "If it be true that religion will be more and more clearly divided in future between those who, accepting the principle of external authority, range themselves along the path which leads to Rome, and those who (with varying pace) follow the flag of freedom in the search for truth, the two great English representatives of these tendencies in the nineteenth century will be John Henry Newman and James Martineau." Such is Mr. Carpenter's final judgment, and there are other words of eloquent tribute in these last pages, for which we must refer our readers to the work itself. They will find in it ample satisfaction for the deepest interest in this wonderful life, and guidance for further study of Dr. Martineau's greater works which will furnish discipline for thought and inspiration for the moral and spiritual life such as few teachers, whether of ancient or of modern times, can afford.

As samples of the wealth of material in the letters included in this volume, we give the following:—

To a Minister in Doubt, Oct. 1, 1842.

"For my own part, I am persuaded that there is only one way in which religion can enter a human heart, viz., by the agency of a higher soul over a lower, an agency natural, indefinable, irresistible. The moments of real consecration to all of us are those in which we stand before some being to whom we look up as nobler and purer than ourselves, who serves the obligations to which we are faithless, and quietly bears sufferings from which we shrink. I know not how to express my sense of the purifying power of this kind of experience. The startling way in which it reveals us to ourselves, and places us in reverential relation to a holiness higher than our own, the manner in which the influence spreads through all the dimensions of the soul at once, and fills it with a clearer atmosphere: the gladness with which we own the power of the greater spirit over us—appear to me to be peculiar and mysterious. . . . : Thus it is in the natural and conscious subordination of spirit to spirit, in the spontaneous assumption by us all of our rank in the great community of souls, that I place the essence and origin of all religion" (p. 198).

To Mrs. Henry Turner, April 22, 1883.

"Many as were the affectionate greetings that brightened my birthday, it was your letter that made it a golden day. It is delightful to me to read in your hand-writing exactly the record of inward experience and the condensed lesson of so many years, which I also should register as the spiritual essence and issue of life. Many things have changed in us and around us since an early sorrow mingled something of a common sanctity with our lives. But one thing remains—Rest in the Love of God, and Trust of all our treasures and ourselves to Him for ever. This is the 'Light at Eventide' that seems to bring back the very colours and sweetness of the dawn" (p. 503).

To F. W. Newman, Oct. 17, 1892.

"I wrong myself in letting your precious letter of August 19th lie so long without a word of thanks, as if in forgetfulness of you. Yet not a day passes, not a question of right and wrong arises, without my turning in thought to you and wondering how you would look at what interests or puzzles me. But the sympathies which bind me to you are all permanent, the same to-morrow as to-day; while the shower of letters which the postman flings at me six times in the week, are full of evanescent affairs which thrust the pen into my hand with the demand, 'Now, or Never.' Had I but the energy and versatility of your friend, Mr. B., I might meet the claims of life in all dimensions at once, and, while managing my little six-acre farm with horse, and cow, and sheep, and pig, and poultry, and kitchen and fruit-garden, and flower-beds, still not lag too far behind in the studies of my Fach, or fail to observe the rule, 'Nulla dies sine linea.' But it is rather my nature to be 'a whole man to one thing at a time'; and so for want of simultaneous self-division, to be for ever incurring and for ever conquering arrears. This, I know, is the unconverted state; and certainly is far below that of Paul, who never once has occasion to use the word, 'repentance.'

"My usual summer routine has been varied this year by two interesting visits; to Jowett's at Balliol, and to the Dublin University Tercentenary. The former was to meet the Bishop of London and Mrs. Temple. I had known all the other authors (except Goodwin) of the 'Essays and Reviews'; and a couple of days with the two survivors who opened and closed the volume seemed a pleasant wind-up to a memorable piece of history" (p. 530).

To the Rev. W. H. Fish, June 5, 1895.

"The intuitions of conscience declare themselves, under adequate interpretation, to be genuine inspirations; and as they exist in various degrees of range and intensity up to a maximum in the pre-eminently holy, we cannot look upon a Christ but as the chief of God's appointed Revealers. In his life of communion with God, religious experience, as known to us, reaches its acme, and the ideal relation between the human spirit and the Divine is realised. If in any other instance the elevation has been reached, it has not been historically presented so as to single itself out as a revelation to us of what we are meant and called to be. If ever something higher is set before us, it will be time enough to quit the step on which we stand. But some objective personalisation of our spriritual sonship to God is essential to hold us in brotherly unity together, and carry a religious inspiration into Morals" (p. 594).

The Christian World, in a notice of Mr. Carpenter's book, made the remark that it was "creditable to him, as a Unitarian, to give the full indication he does of the growing detachment of Martineau from many phases of Unitarian thought, and of his conviction of its failure to capture the English mind." This we take to be a very doubtful compliment to Mr. Carpenter, as though it were conceivable that for some denominational interest he might have blurred the lines of perfect truthfulness in his picture. But those references to the weaknesses of Unitarianism, or of Unitarians in their congregational life, it behoves us to take especially to heart.

In 1865 Dr. Martineau wrote to his friend John James Tayler: "I have small hope of any early widening of the National Church, though that is the end to which I would willingly look. And for generations to come I see no ark of refuge, no retreat for the Christian spirit which is at once catholic and intellectual, but our little Church; and we must keep, if we can, the balance true between the width of its thought and the depth of its devotion." This was his constant aim, as from the early years of his ministry he had been repeatedly pained by what he felt to be a lack of the true spirit of devotion in the congregations. "It is sometimes difficult," he wrote in 1857 to another close friend, John Hamilton Thom, "in our chapels to realise any supporting consciousness of sympathy and to find the aspiring flame with which one's own spirit springs to mingle. As preacher I used to feel this not a little; and now, as hearer in the midst of others (whose aspect and natural language cannot but press upon one's heart), I feel it still more, and often fear that the spirit of true Christian worship and communion has yet to be created among us."

This feeling seems to have deepened with him in later years, so that in 1887 he wrote to Mr. Thom: "The doubt will force itself upon me whether we are worth organising"; and two years earlier, to the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, he said: "It is evident to me that the future of English religion is not with us. Whatever aspects of truth we may have saved from neglect, whatever spiritual resources we may have rendered more accessible, pass into other keeping and need another administration, before they lay hold of the minds and hearts of men. It is the power of Faith that shall prevail. We have it not, except as a feeble residuum from the power of criticism."

He judged his own people, as he judged himself, sternly; and yet with a yearning affection that never failed. We must take his words not for discouragement, but for the searching of our inner life; and remembering how deeply he has stirred all that is best in that life, and what abiding inspiration we have in his own teaching, see whether we cannot disappoint that sorrowful expectation, as he would have delighted to see it disappointed. It may well be that "the future of English religion is not with us." And yet at our own post of duty, in our own churches, which can always be open to the incoming of a new spirit of life, kindled by the inspiration of his word to a deeper devotion and a more strenuous faithfulness, we may find that we have, after all, a part in that happier future, which is to be.

In such endeavour we have in Mr. Carpenter a strong helper, and not the least of the encouragements he has given us is in this new book.

PROMETHEUS BOUND.*

"It is not good for Greek to be alone." Therefore our wise forefathers usually accompanied their Greek texts with Latin versions, wherein the familiarity of the Latin vocabulary and the simplicity of the Greek syntax combined to make very easy reading. As literature these versions were generally quite miraculously poor stuff, but that didn't matter, for we read the Greek. Whereas the easiness of the Latin mattered much, for it enabled our "subliminal consciousness" furtively to seize the meaning of what we were reading through the tail of one of our eyes, while the whole of our conscious self and both our official eyes were intently fixed upon the Greek text, which became exceedingly luminous, and which we read with a running comment of self-congratulation on our increasing knowledge of the Greek language. Now and again we consciously glanced at the Latin, and said to ourselves, "Yes, I thought so," or the like. It was all very pleasant, and was just as it should be.

But modern editors (veiling their inability to write fluent Latin, and their somewhat pedantic scruples against writing unclassical Latin, under various more or less transparent pretences) have dropped this laudable practice, and have even been restrained by terror of the schoolmaster from frankly substituting English translations for the Latin ones. For the fact is that two great literatures have for a long time been regarded mainly as instruments of torture and discipline for youth; and any publication which incidentally enables a depraved boy to baffle the incompetence or evade the cruelty of his oppressor has been regarded as an outrage on public morals. But a better state of things is already dawning, and it seems that we are now to be allowed to read the Greek tragedies at our case; in spite of the possibility of the schoolboy surreptitiously emulating our enjoyment. Caveat Preceptor! It is the schoolmaster's business so to revise his methods of instruction that the schoolboy of easy morals will no longer be able to frustrate him by the judicious expenditure of his pocket money. The reading public "owes a cock to Æsculapius," for it has recovered, or is recovering, from a very grave disease.

And how could we begin better than with the Prometheus Vinctus (the very title reminds us of the dear old days of the Latin crib), and Miss Janet Case's English version? It is no light task to render Æschylus worthily. The vocabulary must be strong and the phrasing sonorous to support the deliberate and weighty stress that Æschylus lays upon line after line and word after word. Seldom indeed does Miss Case's version fail under the strain. To say "never," instead of "seldom," would be to proclaim oneself an untrustworthy guide, for only those who do not know would be capable of believing such a statement, whoever made it and of whatever translator it were made. With this reservation, Miss Case and her readers are to be sincerely congratulated on the sustained dignity and lucidity of this fine rendering.

Of the poem itself, how shall we speak? Its profound suggestiveness and the range of its appeal can perhaps hardly be better illustrated than by the reflection that the great Titan, nailed to his rock, when thought of as the friend of mankind, irresistibly presents himself to us as the pagan counterpart of the Crucified; whilst in his aspect of the defiant foe of supreme power he is the unmistakable prototype of Milton's Satan. Both these aspects mingle, with fresh and beautiful contributions of his own, in Shelley's Prometheus Unbound. And the mention of Shelley's drama reminds us that the splendour of the dramatic representation of Æschylus tantalises us by the mystery (would that it might be dispelled by the discovery of the lost members of the Trilogy!) that hangs over the further developments of the theme; and therefore over the real meaning of the noble fragment we possess. Are we intended, as the orthodox school of critics declares, to sympathise more or less completely with Zeus? Or are we to suppose, as Miss Case more convincingly maintains in her valuable introduction, that Æschylus modified and developed the character of Zeus in the later plays until he regained, in his maturity, the sympathy that he forfeits in the crude stage of newly gotten tyranny presented to us in the Prometheus Bound? Or are we to believe that Zeus is treated by Æschylus purely dramatically, and is frankly to be regarded as the villain of the piece, whose insolence was chastised and humbled in the lost dramas? And round the colossal figures of the two great antagonists (Prometheus always on the stage, Zeus never once appearing, but yet never absent for a moment) play the lights and shadows of the other characters; the brutal callousness of Cratos, the appalled and helpless sympathy of Hephaistos, the insolence of Hermes, the pompous and kindly self-regard of Oceanos, the distracted anguish of Io (Zeus being as mean as he is tyrannical, and finding his victims alike in the helpless maiden and the invincible Titan), and weaving a web of grace and tenderness round the whole, the exquisite Oceanides, with their irrepressible curiosity, their unfailing tenderness, and their heroic loyalty. Delineations of such strength and of such delicate tenderness are beyond the compass of any save the two or three greatest poets of the world.

No doubt if this rich gift which the publishers and the translator-editor have given us is duly appreciated, we may hope for a whole series of Greek dramas. Meanwhile we can but give our hearty thanks for this instalment.

AN EXPLANATION.

SIR,—Would you kindly afford me space for a word of personal explanation, with which I should not have troubled your readers, but that a reference to myself in your issue of this day seems to render it desirable.

When notifying Mr. Bowie of my coming removal to Anerley, I expressed myself to the effect that I thought it likely that the B. & F. U. A. might prefer to include in the projected series of published sermons (to which I had been previously honoured by a request to contribute) only such by writers whose names were on its official roll; and that, therefore, though my manuscript was quite at the Association's disposal, I should not in the least feel hurt by its return. That, as a matter of fact, the Association decided, under the circumstances, to publish the sermon I am glad to regard as evidence of that continued kindly feeling which I hope will not suffer in consequence of my step.

That feeling, I trust, will even survive the frank statement that I am leaving Unitarianism for Congregationalism because my outlook and affinities are in accord with the latter rather than with the current type of the former; this, indeed, must have been evident ever since the publication of my pamphlet "Christianity, the Religion of the Incarnation" four years ago, in which I expounded a view of our Lord's personality far removed from what the acknowledged leader of the denomination, speaking with authority and fulness of knowledge, called "a fulfilled achievement of Unitarian thought." That the spirit of modern Unitarianism has been away from the Christocentric, and making for a more avowedly theistic position scarcely needs stating; that my sympathies are all the other way has been no secret for years to anyone who has done me the honour to read my writings.

In my own pulpit I have ever enjoyed ideal freedom to teach my own Christocentric beliefs, quite irrespectively of their harmony or want of harmony with what might be taught and accepted elsewhere; that is why my present step has no theological significance, i.e., why I am able to pass from Clifton to Anerley while explicitly stating that I am not changing my views, but shall preach what I have always preached, viz., Christ, the Divine Word, as Lord and Saviour. As you quite correctly state, I have "been a minister in one truly Free Church"—I "now go to another," whose members fully understand the circumstances.

I am sure you will allow me, in conclusion, to fulfil a very simple duty in gratefully acknowledging my deep obligations to the religious communion to which I owe my training, not only for the ministry, but in those traditions of the fearless search for truth which alone can make us free, and which in the end will make us one.

May 20, 1905. J. WARSCHAUER.

[Dr. Warschauer's reference to "the acknowledged leader of the denomination, speaking with authority," &c., may set some of our readers wondering, and we therefore give the reference for his quotation. It is from a letter of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's in THE INQUIRER of April 13, 1901. It may also be worth while to refer to the previous and subsequent correspondence, and also to Dr. Warschauer's two articles on "Christianity, the Religion of the Incarnation," which appeared in THE INQUIRERS of May 11 and 18 of that year.—ED. INQUIRER]

A FREE CHURCH.

SIR,—No one can have any objection to a minister making a change for conscience' sake from one denomination to another. Nor can a Unitarian consistently object to a minister who has served in one of our open trust churches transferring himself to a similar church among the Congregationalists. But I do object to the statement in your paragraph last week that the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, in taking up the ministry of the Anerley Congregational Church, has simply removed from one free church to another. A Congregational Church which by its trust deed binds its minister to profess belief in certain doctrines (doctrines, too, quite opposite to those held by Unitarians) cannot properly be described, at least by one of ourselves, as "a free church."

I well remember the controversy which raged about my friend, the Rev. Joseph Halsey, the late minister of this very church, who preached for me in my Croydon pulpit, when I was resident there. The whole force of the objection expressed by a few to his advanced opinions was that, according to the trust deed, the minister, on appointment, was obliged to profess his acceptance of doctrines which were inconsistent with Mr. Halsey's later preaching.

For all I know, Dr. Warschauer may have eschewed his Unitarian opinions; or he may in some other way have felt himself able to fulfil the condition of the trust deed; or he may, by being appointed minister to "the congregation" and not to "the church," have avoided a disagreeable obligation by a technical evasion. But I feel bound, in the honoured name of the open trust, to protest against the description of a church tied down by a doctrinal deed as "a free church."

THIS COMPOST.

ADDENDUM.

THE correspondent who sends us the following notes, prompted by the article with the above title in THE INQUIRER of May 13, has not, we think, grasped the whole of "H. M. L.'s" meaning; but his own thoughts on the subject are well worthy of consideration. In the original article, p. 298, col. 3, line 19, for "fire and life," read "fire of life."

Our other friend writes as follows:—"Let us gaze on the miraculous chemistry of the vegetable world and let us thank God that His laws of growth and that power which desires to heal all our diseases are active in us, also; but do not let us rob ourselves of the precious knowledge that we may help or retard those powers as we will. Only so far as we are not elaborate vegetables are we men;

"'Hope of a loftier fate than to live as the flowers of the field
And even as the flowers to die, hides in our spirit's unrest.'
"'Man is free to grow and cannot resist.'

Cannot he? What then of our companion who, once pure, is now deep in the pit of self-abasement? He wounds his soul; remorse sends floods of healing into the wound, and still he sins and fails. Are we to tell our friend simply that his sin will become insipid, and that he will at last fling it away in disgust? or are we, 'fellow-workers with God,' to labour to bring into his soul that refulgent light, before which the attractive gleam of his sin will fade and become insipid? Surely man has sprung

"'from the slave to the heir,' and dreams of 'a stake in a grander adventure, of deeds in a mightier cause'?"

To enforce his doctrine of the power of will in man, as to which we are sure that "H. M. L." is entirely at one with him, our correspondent concludes with the following quotation from Martineau:—

"We cannot, by ancestral or historical relations, renounce our own free-will, or escape one iota of its awful trusts. No faith which fails to keep this truth distinct and prominent, no faith which shuffles with the sinner's moral identity, contains the requisites of a 'doctrine according to godliness.'"

THE best way to prepare ourselves for the work of any other world is to do well our work in this; let us be lavish spenders of our love, and be made the more eager to serve our fellow-men to-day by every warning that we may be marched away from them to-morrow.—H. W. Crosskey.

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.—IV.

THISTLE: "BE STURDY AND INDEPENDENT."

"Much wetness, neglect, and land out of heart,
Makes thistles a number forthwith to upstart.
If thistles so growing prove lusty and long,
It signifieth land to be hearty and strong."

Perhaps this curious old English verse has given rise to the idea that the thistle is not merely a very prickly plant, but has something pleasantly sturdy and strong about it, and it is nice to believe that it is this idea that has made it such a general favourite among the Scotch people. They have taken it for the emblem of their country, and the same poet who wrote the above lines wrote two more, contrasting a thistle and a Scotchman.

"The thistle, everlasting, stout and lusty,
The Scotsman, everlasting, true and trusty."

I find in some books that the thistle is taken to be the emblem of untidiness and carelessness because it is often found growing, not so much where land is desolate and dreary, as where good land is neglected. But it is a great deal pleasanter, is it not, to think of its being the emblem of strength, ("everlasting, stout and lusty") than to have it meaning untidiness and carelessness. It has another meaning, and that is independence. You can hardly look at a thistle's prickly leaves and spikes without seeing the truth of it. It seems to ask to be left alone, and to thrust its prickles at you to prevent anyone interfering with it because it is so well able to take care of itself. Perhaps it is for this reason that the Scotch people chose it for their national flower, emblem of their bold motto: "Wha daur meddle wi' me."

I have heard people say that the thistle is not like a flower at all, and not even pretty to look at, but that is hardly fair, for many thistles are really beautiful. The great silver thistles that dot the mountains in Switzerland, and the lake country in England, and the hills of Scotland, are very handsome indeed. They last, in all their silvery freshness, for months, if you bring them home, and the purple thistles of Scotland and Wales also have beautiful shades of colour.

The "Carline thistle" is so like an everlasting flower, that it scarcely changes at all even when it is dead, and often lasts through the winter looking quite fresh, till the new thistles grow up in the spring. There is a quaint old legend about this particular thistle, and how it got its name from the great Emperor Charlemagne. It says that on one occasion, the emperor was engaged in war, and was very much troubled because an illness broke out in his army, and many of his men sickened and died one after another. When he had tried everything he knew of to cure his men, and still they continued to fall ill, he was so unhappy that he prayed earnestly to God for help. In answer to his prayer, an angel appeared with a cross-bow and told the Emperor that he was going to shoot an arrow.

"Mark well the spot where the arrow falls!" said the angel, "for there will you find a plant that shall cure the sickness that troubles you!"

The arrow fell upon a thistle, and the Emperor caused numbers to be gathered and brought into the camp, where a juice was squeezed from the leaves, that cured the men who were so ill. From this legend, country people used to have great faith in the Carline thistle, and believe that it could cure almost anything. Many old people still call it "the blessed thistle" for the same reason.

There are many legends telling us how the thistle was taken by Scotland to be the national badge, but this one I am going to tell you is said to be the oldest.

We are told that a party of Danes attempted to surprise the Scottish army. The Danes, as a rule, scorned to attack their enemies by night, and said that no good warriors fought except by day. However, this once, to their cost, they decided to turn aside from their rule, and attack the Scots. Noiselessly, under cover of the darkness, they crept towards the sleeping camp, when suddenly a Dane trod upon a thistle with his naked foot! He was so startled that he cried out suddenly with pain, and in a moment the Scots were roused, and with a "mighty shout," rushed to drive back their enemies. They afterwards chose the thistle for their badge because of the help its prickly leaves had given them.

There is another story, however, which tells us the thistle was simply chosen in council. "Time was," says the story, "when a company of bearded men, with high crowned hats, and doublets met in solemn conclave within the walls of the old Council House at Edinburgh, and consulted whether they would place the thistle upon their banner instead of the figure of Saint Giles, which had borne many a storm for ages past, and had floated above many a battle-field. The thistle having been decided upon, it soon afterwards waved on every banner throughout Scotland!"

FLORENCE LAWFORD.

THE commencement of the 14th year of the Invalid Children's Home was celebrated, as usual, by an At Home at Winifred House on the first Saturday in May, when some sixty guests assembled in the garden, where the nineteen little inmates were eagerly awaiting them.

Miss M. Pritchard, in giving a welcome in the name of the Committee and of the Lady Superintendent, referred first of all to the death of her late colleague, Mr. Robert Hampson, whose interest in the Home had been keen to the last. She then spoke a few words upon the work of the year, which had been most satisfactory. The annual meeting will be held on Monday next, the 29th inst. (as advertised in another column), at which friends will be heartily welcomed.

The guests expressed great pleasure at the appearance and arrangements of the Home, which showed their best on that sunshiny afternoon; the one thing that needed improvement was the garden ground, which wanted regravelling very badly. A little fund was started in order that this could be done (for the general funds were not available for such purposes), and £4 out of the £8 required were gathered in during the afternoon. Miss M. Pritchard will be very glad to receive small contributions from any friends who would like to help to make up the remainder.

THE POWER OF THE CROSS.

WE hope that many of our readers have procured and have been studying Dr. FORSYTH'S address, as Chairman of the Congregational Union, on "A Holy Church the Moral Guide of Society." The second part, which deals with present-day problems of moral and social life, seems to us of the highest value; the first part, which expounds a theory of religion, is also of great value, but we find it much more questionable. The present article is a note on one central point in the first part of the address.

"Our Churches need a spirit of holiness far more than a spirit of work, and they need it for the work's sake and the sake of love." So said Dr. FORSYTH to his Congregational brethren. But that spirit of holiness, he declared, is to be found only in one way. "In the Holy Cross we have the moral principle of the universe which the Church has to administer and adjust to the successive phases of human society." (P. 19.) "The cross of CHRIST was, before all else, an offering made by GOD to His own holiness; it was the finished and effectual restitution of His holiness upon the ruins of the evil power." (P. 26.) "We need for the moral purposes of society a CHRIST who redeems because He atones, and atones because He is holy, and is holy because He is GOD. CHRIST'S redemption is as wide as His Godhead. He secures social goodness because He incarnates and secures GOD'S holiness. He satisfies and commands the evil conscience of mankind because of the satisfaction His holiness was to the holy conscience of GOD. The Holy GOD found Himself in the holiness of the Cross, and in the same act established His Kingdom," (P. 30.)

We understand Dr. FORSYTH to maintain that unless one believes these things one can have no part in CHRIST'S kingdom, and no knowledge of the true power of holiness, through which alone the Church can do its work of redeeming love in the world. We, therefore, who do not believe these things, who do not believe that CHRIST was "Holy Godhead itself redeeming" (p. 10), must ask whether we are to be so shut out from the kingdom of GOD, from the fellowship of CHRIST'S disciples, deprived of the quickening power which faith in him can give. Dr. FORSYTH laments that there are circles in his own communion "where the Cross is regarded as exhibitory, where GOD'S love is detached from holy judgment and atonement, and is only associated with merciful and exemplary sacrifice." So, he says, Religion tends to lose its dignity. Such doctrine "carries with it the belittlement of human life." We who, as Unitarians, see in the cross simply the supreme martyrdom of human history, must fall even more absolutely under Dr. FORSYTH'S censure, and be in his judgment incapable of realising the solemn issues of life, or serving with any effectual power in the great conflict in which evil is to be overcome by good.

So we are bound to ask of Dr. FORSYTH'S high doctrine, Is it true? Is there no real hope for us unless we can accept this doctrine of Atonement, which declares that within the moral unity of a trinity of persons, "Holy God overcame the world?"

We go back to the simplest elements of our moral and spiritual life, and find ourselves at once in the companionship of JESUS. His teaching, we confess, appears to us sufficient, when he is the teacher, to lead us to the Father, and to show the way to victory for His kingdom.

Let us take first the historical fact of the crucifixion. If CHRIST, says Dr. FORSYTH, was but the protagonist of martyrs, "then conscience in its holiest possible form was swamped by the world." Is that true? Who is it that has the victory on every field of martyrdom? Not the powers of evil, surely, which for a moment triumph over a poor broken body. The victor in the spiritual realm is he who suffers fearlessly for a noble cause, even unto death. Out of that very agony is born, for those who understand the reason of his death, a new passion of loyalty to the holy cause, and triumphant faith in the Divine significance and ultimate triumph of righteousness and truth and love. So, we are convinced, though legend has veiled for us the actual history of that great event, the Christian Church was born, from the cross of self-sacrifice and fearless testimony; and the death of JESUS had such transcendent power, because of what his life had been.

The life and teaching, says Dr. FORSYTH, are not sufficient. They will not give us the requisite knowledge of redeeming love or motive force for true Christian service. "Sympathy is not adequate to redeem. God's love is all sympathy, and more. It is sanctity. It means the moral principle of holiness which in the cross is in standing conflict with the egoism which rules the world." To that one might say, Amen; only not with the implication that no one can really understand and feel the power of sanctity, who does not accept Dr. FORSYTH'S interpretation of the cross. Sympathy is not adequate to redeem unless it have a firm hold upon righteousness, and acknowledge the dominion of the eternal law. But if one learns of JESUS, if one knows that they are blessed who hunger after righteousness, not as an idle sentiment, but in the steadfast service of a faithful life, and that the pure in heart see GOD, can it be said that amid the stern discipline of life, with the knowledge also of love that is faithful unto death, the full measure of holiness is beyond the reach of such experience? "GOD'S love is all sympathy, and more. It is sanctity."

Is not the love of an honourable man all sympathy, and something more? It also lives in sanctity. He will die, He will endure that the beloved also should die, rather than be false. Is it not faithlessness to the solemn trust of our humanity, and blindness to its highest glory, to deny such capacity to man? JESUS did not think so meanly of our nature, and he bids us follow him. PAUL also said we might be heirs of GOD, and joint-heirs with CHRIST, if we dared to suffer with him. Dr. FORSYTH holds that we have no true knowledge of the fatherhood till we see it "revealed on the Cross." "The father of the prodigal is not so great and holy as the Father of our Lord JESUS CHRIST crucified." "Redemption is a greater thing than foregiveness, and the prodigal's father did not redeem." Does he who makes such a statement really enter into the mind of JESUS, the author of that story? Did not the father's love redeem? Was there no thought of sanctity, and that by the power of love the holy law would now cleanse the sinner's heart, and keep him steadfast in righteousness? Here, again, we seem to come upon a strange poverty of faith, and we prefer to hold to the Master's word, and to pray simply that we may be more true to his spirit in the service of our lives.

In every simple act of duty, as it seems to us, we have a hold upon the Eternal Righteousness, and the way opens for more perfect knowledge of the Divine Holiness; in every effort of unselfish love the conviction is deepened that love is greatest of all, and must have the victory at last. The Cross of CHRIST is the supreme witness of those great truths, as they live and work in our humanity towards the perfect coming of the Kingdom. The Cross is such a witness because he was and is the Friend who above all others helps us in our need, and opens to us the glory of our human life as children of the FATHER in heaven. It should be sufficient for the disciple, in the fellowship of lowly service and undying love, to be led in that true way.

RUSSIA IN REVOLUTION.*

THE appearance of Mr. G. H. Perris's volume entitled "Russia in Revolution" is very timely. The author gives us some account of those recent events which have arrested and shocked Western Europe. But he does much more than this, sketching the historical, political, economic causes of unrest, and bringing us face to face with many of the actors in the revolution, alike some of those whose reputation is world-wide, and others whose names were unfamiliar. Thus the book contains an answer to many of the questions which we ask one another when we talk about Russia. It yields just such information as is wanted, and does it in a thoroughly interesting manner.

Perhaps the first question usually asked is whether we are indeed watching a Revolution. "For thirty-five years," writes Mr. Perris, "the war between an infatuated State and a slowly awakening people has been waged with increasing violence." In other words, we find in Russia two strongly opposed powers, each of which has arrived at a full self-consciousness and is moved by stern determination to achieve its ends. On the one side is a State, on the other a People. The Russian State government is extremely centralised, imperial, predatory. The Russian People are by tradition peaceful, co-operative, collective in their aims and mode of life. The present struggle between rulers and ruled is a strife of discrepant ideals, as well as of opposed powers.

The State is a bureaucracy acting upon the people by two arms, the police and the priesthood. Every right which we regard as elementary, right of meeting and of movement, of press and speech, of religion and thought, has been denied. But can thought be bound? Ultimately, of course, it cannot. But Russian law attempts the impossible. It is not only a penal offence to alter the constitution, but to attempt to do so; not only a crime to attempt, but even to intend to attempt at a distant future! In speaking of law we must not be misled by our conceptions of law. (We should have had some analogy if the Stuart policy of government by proclamation had succeeded.) The Russian laws are numerous, and show much legal acumen. Some of them appear to be liberal and humane. Freedom of conscience, e.g., is explicitly granted, but special statutes withdraw it in particular from almost every form of Dissent. Then the essence of law is that it shall be known. Well, Russian laws are published—except those which are unpublished; "except such orders as are to be kept secret," as the code has it. And of course all these laws, the known and the unknown, are arbitrary decrees. This would seem bad enough. But even these laws are only appealed to by Government at its mere whim. Whenever it is more convenient they are set aside by an "administrative process."

There is every opportunity for oppression and injustice in such a system. How intolerably perfidious and corrupt the actual working of the system proves may be learnt from Mr. Perris's pages. One boy is forced to think, and finally to revolt, by hearing of the hanging of five students for distributing Socialistic literature; University students are expelled, are flogged by Cossacks for holding a meeting; a veterinary surgeon is sent into penal servitude for holding "free conversations"; an inquiry in lunacy is ordered for a man who sent a petition to the Empress, a thing which only a madman could do. And this suggests the system of espionage and atmosphere of suspicion which are universal. Freedom from such molestation can, indeed, often be obtained, but only by the bribing of the proper officials. Of the atrocities which result from the arbitrary stupidity of officials I say nothing. They may be found in this volume in no sparse crop. Only it should always be remembered in reading of them that these exceptional, excessive cruelties are not the worst, just because they are exceptional. It is less easy to describe the hardships of the more normal experiences of social existence. But it is these, just because they are daily incidents of life in town or country, which really explain why the autocracy has become intolerable to the people.

If criticism is to be made on Mr. Perris's book, it will probably be either on the ground of his sweeping condemnation of the Government, or on the ground that he has undervalued its strength. In places the writing is rather indiscriminate, and we regret this because it may obscure the truth of the indictment, which is in its main lines sober and sound. Perhaps, also, he is less than just to the abilities of M. Witte. And perhaps the bureaucracy altogether has more resisting power than it is credited with. But in this connection there is one point on which Mr. Perris gives us very instructive information. The real support of the Government would seem to be in the capitalistic class, the interests of which are so largely identical with its own. But the class which draws industrial profits is largely resident in Western Europe. The shareholders are not Russian at all, but German or French or English. Economically this may be bad; politically, however, it is easily seen that shareholders in England cannot affect the struggle as Russian shareholders could do. The facts given on pp. 153-5 have an important bearing on the prospects of the revolution.

We turn now to the second of the opposing forces—the People. And we must notice the singularly clear sketch of the various phases of the revolutionary movement. Here Mr. Perris is writing from the fulness of personal acquaintance or friendship with many of the actors; and probably the biographical sketches of the men and women who have suffered for freedom will prove the most generally interesting part of the book. In several instances we hear Russians themselves speaking in the autobiographical fragments which enliven these pages. In this way we pass from the early liberal thinkers through successive phases to the present day. The movement falls into two periods, "divided by a short interval of exhaustion." The first phase, to which the name Nihilism was commonly but inaccurately attached, extended from 1870 to about 1885, and it was in the main a movement of the intelligenzia, though some workmen and peasants and a few soldiers took part in it. The second phase, commencing about 1890, is no less distinctly marked by the part taken by the workmen, though these have been supported by a number of the educated classes larger than ever before, and by an increasing susceptibility of the peasantry (p. 187). These two main periods are further divided up until we trace the whole progress from the small band of generous if slightly vague radical thinkers to the now growing solidarity of many classes, with clear and drastic demands for a thorough reconstruction of society.

We trace the progress of an idea, but we are enabled to follow it and to feel it in the lives of actual men and women. Some of them are living amongst us to-day, others are in Paris, or America, or wherever it may be. And our English national life is the fuller and nobler for having such men in our midst. But through what tribulation, accompanied by what toil and pain of body, what indignation and despair of soul, have they passed! When we see, or hear, or read one or other of the refugees, says Dr. Soskice, editor of Free Russia, we can turn to these pages and learn something of the terrible conflict they have endured. And then, and beyond these, the men with names, lies the great crowd of the nameless, the men and women of East London—the poor, the obscure, but also the human, for whom hitherto there has been, if not a welcome, yet a refuge in this country, a refuge which, to our shame, we are proposing to deny them.

In the gallery of portraits are many women—Marie Vetrova, Angela Karpouzi, Vera Figrier, Vera Zassulitch, Elizabeth Kovalsky, Hope Sigida beaten to death in a Siberian prison. Is it not too horrible? It is horrible. But that is only a part, even a small part. It is human. We follow the short life history of these and many other women, and we gain a more and more intimate insight into Russian life, into its aims, ideals, ambitions, and possibilities. These are lives out of which romance is woven; indeed, they are romantic in their idealism and their daring, in bold venture of "hope and hazard." Everything we read about Russia suggests how large a part is played by women. Now Russia is different in many ways from the West—not least in regard to the woman question. In other lands the woman's rights crusade has been marked by some lack of perfectly definite aim—it was largely and at first for freedom in the abstract. Think of Ibsen's heroine of the "Doll's House," who needed to leave home merely to find herself. In Russia it is not so. The Russian woman, almost from the moment in which she resolved to be free, regarded freedom as means to end. The immediate end was perhaps no more exciting than to teach peasants to read. That matters not. Personal freedom was discovered as a moment in the duty of social service. The sense of responsibility to and for one's fellows is a great force in Russia. It has traditional sanction in artel and village community, and it is one of the clear notes of the revolutionary struggle.

This people prepared in its national spirit, and apprenticed through its history to the principles of human solidarity, stands face to face with its destiny. It is true that the masses are ignorant, that they include many savage or semi-savage peoples, that poverty and dire destitution are their familiar lot. The task before them is long and hard. The issue may be more distant than Mr. Perris hopes. But we are justified in thinking with him that the ultimate result cannot be doubtful. And since in this time of crisis the sympathy of a neighbouring people is not without its value, we welcome this volume, which is so well calculated to arouse not only interest in, but admiration for, the Russian people in their struggle for a freer and more humane national life.

ITALIANA.

My little four-year-old boy informed all and sundry of his grown-up friends that his "father was travelling in Italy, and that he was going about in a gondola." Now that we are chained once more to our galley of routine, it is most convenient for our free spirit to glide about the scenes of our recent tour in a gondola, which is near enough, for the purpose, to Wordsworth's and like a gondola, we shall doubtless make some sudden sallies, dash round impossible corners and appear where least expected. By thirty hills we'll hurry down, or slip between the ridges, by many a large or little town, and half a hundred bridges. Only for hills we must read mountains, for ridges, ravines and precipices, and for half a hundred, at least, some hundreds of bridges, especially remembering the elegant ones over every canale, calle, or rio in Venice, and the classical ones over the Arno. The editor, lately on his travels, but having had to return in "a blind fury" to his "abhorred shears," and envious of the nine who did not return, pines for news of Siena, San Gimignano, Volterra; modesty only, we suppose, restraining him from pining for notes about Pisa, Lucca, Pistoia, Poretta, Bologna, Como, Lugano, Milan and Bâle. Or perhaps he has chartered the professor, or the painter, or "il Papa" (whoso readeth, let him understand), or one of the fair saints, Cecilia, Placida, Filippina, or the Recording Angel of the Lady Bountiful herself, to write of the enchantments that followed on Volterra. But it is characteristic of the editor to choose the hill cities, and the cities of towers. He ("broken loose," of course) soared on "the wings of delight." Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn brushing with hasty steps the dews away, to meet the sun upon the upland lawn; but more oft we saw him hovering on the tops of towers, taking a bird's-eye view of the situation. At Siena he rose to his highest flight, and looked down upon the star-shaped city. We all regretted at Bologna that he was not with us, for the sake of the famous "due torri," that make one dizzy to look at, even from below, and the shorter of which two towers, likened by Dante to the giant Antaeus, made him wish, he said, at the first glance, that he were in some other street. These would have been worthy of the editor's highest flights. They lean in opposite directions, the one 4 ft., and the other 10 ft. out of the perpendicular.

"little boat

The nine, whom the editor left behind at Siena, combined to lament his departure with "a melodious tear." And, then, the only weighty person left to steady us was he whom he called the Professor, and who (so the courier, worthy man, informed us) was generally understood by the natives to be at least a Cardinal Archbishop (of course "broken loose"). And, truth to say, one would have looked in vain for what Heine would call "the Protestant critical nose," or "the thin rationalistic legs"; there was nothing Protestant or rationalistic about the famous author of "The Two Tendencies" and of the book of "Genesis." His one tendency was to seek diligently for the occult in obviously rudimentary art, and his other was to have no dealings with the nineteenth century and after. We played Bo-Peep with twelve rudimentary sheep on a bas-relief, and a "little caprioling creature," alleged to be a lamb, carried us with a bound into the thirteenth century. He taught us to find some peculiar sermons in stones, and good in everything thirteenth century. Whenever we saw his mind wandering we knew by his glittering eye that he was lost in some selva oscura of the Dark Ages. At such times I have heard him address a buxom Italian matron as Signore, Signora, Signorina, all in one breath, while all the world wondered. The way we bowed down to stocks and stones would do anyone good to see who was disposed to think of us as wanting in devotion, or strong in commonsense. But this was generally when we found ourselves exclaiming to the glittering eye, "now wherefore stopp'st thou me?"

But my gondola has got into a rio of digression, and we have many things to recall before we anchor at Siena, and contemplate that star and its candido giglio, Santa Caterina. As our memory saunters along this tour in which there were few, if any, lost moments, we are amazed at the multitudinous scenes and sights we saw. In a panorama the scenes move round us, here we had the delightful experience of going round the scenes, at least for a very large part of our time. A spell of almost unbroken fine weather favoured us. Our coaches were drawn by the best and most willing of buoni cavallini, worthy of the pheasant feathers in their caps. What music was in their bells, what music was in their clattering hoofs as they dashed through the narrow flagged streets of the larger towns. The extra horses or mules that helped us up steep ascents brought with them some cheerful and sturdy specimens of Italian humanity, and we all admired the stalwart girl mule-driver Margherita, as she paced like an Amazon the steep-up hill to Volterra, at her mule's head. We envied our artist many times as we saw characteristic scenes, buildings, or people take shape like magic under his brush. Would that we could dash them in words upon our paper, for here some of them appear vividly enough to the mind's eye. We envied the hand that dashed a whole meadow of Vallombrosan crocuses on to his sketch book, but here they are gleaming before us in purple and gold with the charming background of "Etrurian shades." We see the still water where Vallombrosa mirrored her solemn beauty. Again, we see an entrancing spot where we are gathering pink cyclamens, wild, somewhere on the way to Siena. We see again the abounding rathe primroses that glorified the approaches to Asolo. We start again at the poppies that seemed strangely autumnal in the midst of the earliest spring. What leagues of vines trailing on pollard mulberries and maples we pass. How bewitching the olives at last become! Is it because green has been transmuted into silvery grey, and the lights and shades can have endless play in those small leaves? Botticelli's entrancing "Pallas Athene Taming the Centaur" makes evident that no other leaves, no other tree could ever have been appropriate to the Goddess of Wisdom. What industry is displayed in the minutely careful festooning of the vines! What a large part women play in the toilsome, patient labours of the field. As large a part, meek-eyed, and patient is played by those white kine (how rarely any other colour was seen) with their huge horns and huge yokes, drawing the homely ploughs, and still more homely, springless, wicker carts. Rarely did we lose sight of the snow flanked mountains of the Alps or the less exalted Apennines. Once again we see Lake Garda like a flowing sapphire, and hear the astonished exclamations at such blueness. Lakes Como and Lugano revealed other possibilities in colour studies. And, oh! the rivers! Some of these rivers had flowed with a romantic course before our mind's eye long ago, and had murmured under moon and stars in our mind's ear. We traced the Adige while as yet it was in Austria, and was called the Etsch; we had seen the Iser rolling rapidly; we saw the Arno from many interesting points, chiefly at Florence and Pisa; the Serchio, we saw at Lucca, famous for oil and silk. We followed the Reno from its source near Poretta to Bologna. The drive from Pistoia, a town of surprises, to Poretta was like a bit of fairyland, and the endless waterfalls were to the sight and ear things to wonder at. Smaller rivers, like the Ombrone and the Elsa give their name to beautiful vales, San Gimignano being in the Val d'Elsa. A thousand casual things we noted; greater or less shades of difference between our scenes and Italian, between our customs and ways and theirs. The houses attracted attention, so often coloured yellow ochre with the characteristic shutters of every tint, though chiefly grey, green, or heliotrope. Wells of every size and description there were, and yet acqua potabile seemed a rare luxury. But mineral waters and the vine are perhaps a sufficient substitute. Our method of travelling combined plain living and high thinking with plain thinking and high living. We were thus enabled to see the most lowly Inns, Alberghi, and appreciate the lowliest fare prepared under all conditions of varying skill, good-will, and good humour, and the topmost hotels with all the most modern appliances. In the Alberghi we found that the name of macaroni was legion. At meals, at any rate, during our coaching days we lived largely on macaroni. Between meals we lived largely on symbols and the correct ideas of our favourite authors.

But it is time to moor our "little boat, shaped liked the crescent moon," though we would fain glance at a score of lovely paintings, and unveil them for a moment as they used to be to us, and cast a light as bright, if we could, as that that some custodians cast upon them from a large metal disc. Ah! those custodians, indispensable, no doubt, and pardonable, but there might some day a new order be founded of the knights and ladies of the Golden Fleece. We will just take a last glimpse of these angelic Putti, peeping in, last of all, at the Cathedral at Lucca, where we will beg that little Putto of Fra Bartolommeo's praising Our Lady and her saints with all his voice and viol, to help us to do the same. We will moor our "little boat" in front of the Cathedral of Siena, with which in the judgment of some there is nothing to compare either in Venice or Florence, and certainly its floor or pavement is unique. The last thing our eyes rest upon as we disembark is the superb tower del Mangia in that star-like city. Da ogni parte si scorge la snella e superba torre del Mangia, che slancia fra le nubi la sua rôcca merlata, le sue forme spigliate e graziose. Which means that it is the sweetest thing of its kind anywhere to be seen.

BY A MINISTER.

XX.

The word "prejudice," I have seen it said, is really a neutral word, meaning nothing more than judgment formed beforehand, and ought therefore to belong as much to favourable as to unfavourable judgment. Its use, then, in a purely bad sense bears mournful witness to the fact that the worse construction is that to which men habitually and more willingly lean. Pre-judgment is almost invariably harsh judgment.

There may be some truth in this, but I am inclined to think that the habit sprang much more from natural necessity than frommoral perversity. The instinct at the root of it was the instinct of self-defence. Animals in a natural state always begin with unfavourable judgment. A stranger, even of their own kind, is an enemy; the unwonted is also the suspected. Young children, in the same way, do not give the benefit of doubt, but eye with distrust an unfamiliar face. Prejudice in this stage is only healthy cautiousness.

A similar history belongs to the word "innovation." Strictly speaking, innovation is the introduction of that which is new, whether good or bad. But that which is new is that which ought certainly to be challenged, and the challenging habit has attached to the word its sinister meaning.

Here, however, the defence of prejudice ends. Persisted in and clung to, it is condemned under the warning words, "Judge not according to appearance, but judge righteous judgment." They were spoken in the first instance to some who were shocked to see a sick man, suddenly made well, carrying his bed on the Sabbath day. It was according to appearance—the look of the thing—that they judged. "He is gone in to lodge with a man that is a sinner." This was another case. Appearances were certainly against Zacchæus. He was a publican; he was rich. The man of little stature was looked down upon, and the very sight of him confirmed evil thoughts of him. "Behold, a woman which was in the city, a sinner." This was a third instance; and here too the appearance of things was bad; what must that woman be who was bold enough to enter uninvited, and unaccompanied, where men sat at meat?

Here again it may be said that, up to a certain point, social prejudice is justified. It is an attitude of guardedness, of circumspection. Society must protect itself; externals must be studied; custom and law will always count for a great deal, and it is our duty to be critical. Publicans and sinners are offenders against public morals, and a public judgment formed beforehand is the best of all checks or breakwaters to throw in their way. Public sentiment is in most cases public prejudice. What then did Christ reprove? He reproved the judgment which does well to be guided at first by the general look of things, but is wrong when it is only superficial, will not go below the surface in particular cases. Prejudice is really lack of penetration. If this man were a prophet, said the Pharisee host, he would have perceived who and what manner of woman this is, whereas the prophet is one who sees that which is deeper even than sin—the goodness beneath it. The people Christ condemned were the people who refused to reconsider their prima facie right judgments, in order to make them righteous; who said that no good thing could come out of Nazareth, though good things might come even from Beelzebub; that to eat with unwashed hands was to be defiled; that those who knew not the law were accursed; that a religious teacher who ate and drank like other men was a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber. Righteous judgment goes down into the truth and reality of things, and judges them by further evidence than that which first strikes the eye. Better than movements of precaution are ventures of trust. To the words, "Thy faith hath saved thee," Christ might often have added, "My faith also." His belief in humanity was the saving of humanity. Faith is penetration into that which is hidden, whereas prejudice is only the recognition of that which is obvious. It was a new thing to publican and sinner to be discovered, and the first step in recovery.

To grow older is with some of us to grow more prejudiced. Opinions harden with age, and the first impressions are also the last. We fall into cliques; we come under the power of maxim and phrase and wise saws which save us the trouble and risk of experiment; we are partisans, and cling through thick and thin to conclusions which must not be disturbed. Or, it may be, increasing years have taught us the wisdom of after-judgment. They have widened our view, calmed our reasoning, softened our speech. To prudence, we have added charity—to the hasty judgment of the eye, the amended judgment of the heart. If, as Emerson says, prudence is the science of appearances, charity is the insight which sees through them.

THE MYSTERY OF THOUGHT.

How is it? Does the Will our thoughts create,
Or only stir the latent seeds to grow?
Or do we but dispose the brain and wait
The unknown inward flow?

We may not tell unless by what we feel;
And who shall say his thoughts can be constrain'd?
Or that he did more service than reveal
The thought by thinking gain'd?

So, let him be a toiling, unread man,
And the idea, like an added sense,
Of God informing all his life, he can
With many a book dispense:

The fine conviction, too, that Death, like Sleep,
Wakes into higher dream—this thought will brook
Denial of the libraries, and keep
The key of many a book.

ROBERT LEIGHTON.

ACCORDING to the annual report recently issued of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union, there are in the United Kingdom 29,093 bands of hope and other Juvenile temperance societies, with an estimated membership of 3,480,288, an increase of 327 societies and 141,500 members on the returns of last year, representing an enormous number of young people being trained in habits of sobriety and self-control. The 349 county, town, district and denominational unions throughout the country are progressing rapidly and largely extending their operations. The "School Scheme" secured the delivery in 996 cities, towns, or villages of 4,025 addresses in schools and institutions, attended by 387,104 scholars and 12,225 teachers; 247,741 reports of the lectures having been written by the children in the form of essays or examination papers.

SPEAKING at the recent annual rally of the Baptist Total Abstinence Association in London, Mr. George White, M.P., said the ministerial membership had more than doubled since 1884; eight Baptist colleges reported that all their students were total abstainers; and in two others there were only nine students who had not signed the pledge. In reviewing the Temperance year, he thought it was a matter for thanksgiving that the Government had not introduced another "Temperance measure." The Licensing Act of last year was a "great sham," and its working most unsatisfactory. In Norwich, for instance, it had not closed a single public-house, though without it the city would probably have been able to get rid of nearly fifty licences

OBJECT LESSONS.

IT is not so great a misfortune as it sometimes seems that Protestant Christianity has during recent years been somewhat troubled in its mind. It has felt a little uncertain about its titles. It has been conscious of near and dangerous rivals. It used to know too much. It was in the habit of laying down the terms of salvation with uncompromising precision. It knew why God became man, and when, and how. It knew what would be the fate of the misguided people who denied its statements or doubted them. It quoted its "Thus saith the Lord," or "It is written," with full confidence that the matter in hand was settled, and that none but an infidel would contest the authority of its texts, or make quibbles about small points in the translation.

That it has been compelled to consider some of these small points, to remove certain doubtful passages from its quotable scriptures, and to overhaul its claims in regard to the scriptures generally, has not been a pleasant, but it has been a salutary experience.

It is as if a man of science who with all agnostic humility had laid down his definitions of matter, and explained its functions, till he had made it capable of covering and ruling all things visible and invisible, had gradually discovered that matter itself began to elude and disappoint him; that the world he had built upon a fine monistic basis was very well made but was not real, that it had very little in common with the actual world in which people live. In such a case, a wise man would take time to consider. He would hold provisionally by his philosophy, would endeavour to make himself more particularly acquainted with just those facts which seemed least friendly to his conclusions, and meanwhile would confine his teachings mainly to things certain; he would give such object lessons as must be useful and sound, whatever fate might be in store for his philosophy.

So Christians, now that one thing and another that tradition handed down, or that the scriptures proved, or that good people believed have become doubtful, are wisely turning their attention to certain neglected elementary truths and giving object lessons in righteousness. As the great Joseph Butler, at a time when, according to his declaration, most fashionable people spoke and acted as if Christianity had been proved false, took the opportunity to lecture men on the moral nature, on the function of conscience, and on certain truths pertaining to the mind and will of man which would remain valid whatever might become of the Catholic faith; so some of our wisest teachers are trying to steady the general judgment and avert a wild and unreasoning scepticism by lessons drawn from those regions of thought and life that are accessible alike to him who retains and to him who abandons the doctrines of the traditional creeds.

One of the ablest Wesleyans, the Rev. W. L. Watkinson, has set forth in a little book* called "Inspiration in Common Life," lessons in wise thinking and holy living that are absolutely independent of orthodox theology, though occasionally, the sanctioned terms of that theology are used.

The glory of common things, which was the special message of Wordsworth; the grandeur of all manly labour when it is understood as co-operation with the will of God, accordng to the doctrine of St. Paul; the possibility of learning a divine economy of one's gifts and resources till, like Paul, one is equally ready to be abased or to abound; the privilege of living in the higher latitudes of thought and imagination. These and other lessons are suggested and enforced in language at once chaste and bold.

These lessons are in no wise dependent upon the creeds. They must have been evolved in some way or other from the spiritual experience of mankind if the resurrection of Christ's body had never been asserted, if Luke's poetic account of the birth of Jesus and John had never been written, if no one had seen Jesus walk on the sea. They are lessons that are suggested by the actual lives and recorded thoughts of good men and women. They are not myths, they are object lessons in goodness.

Like all moral teaching, the doctrines of this little book are liable to abuse. The optimistic view which finds this world so admirable, and so full of delightful possibilities, could be perverted to the use of an unworthy contentment. And in one case the writer himself has perverted his own perfectly sensible doctrine by a false illustration of the virtue of prudence. To commend the "sulphur and supplication" method of self cure practised by John Wesley is very well; to say that as a grand rule, godly life must follow prudential lines is very well. It is more doubtful to justify the Christian missionary in invoking the "secular arm" to protect him from the result of his own deliberate defiance of the prejudices of a foreign people. When we are told that a band of soldiers encircles with a ring of steel, the traders' chests of opium; that is not an argument for demanding a band of soldiers to protect the man who bears "the sacred vessels of godliness," it is an argument against the army itself as at present constituted. "The army and navy constitute the barbed wire of the national vineyard," says Mr. Watkinson. Do they? Why is it then that all Germany as represented by its newspapers gets into a panic about some chance remarks of an official of our Government concerning the Navy of Great Britain and its possible future duties? A neighbourhood does not get into a panic about a new piece of barbed wire around a garden. Our army and navy are known to be aggressive and not defensive merely. "It is a painful necessity," says the writer "that we sometimes draw the sword." It would be unblushing hypocrisy to which our whole history would give the lie, if we pretended that the sword had only been drawn in case of necessity, or that it had been drawn always with reluctance and pain.

If once Mr. Watkinson can get Christian people to sanction the mad competition of our nation with others in wishing for peace and preparing for war; if he can silence their objections to it by calling it Christian prudence, he might as well withdraw all the other lessons of the book. As soon as some politician or lord of the Admiralty plunges us into another war we shall not want, as a nation, to know the beauty of common things, or to learn the management of God's gifts, we shall do as we have done before, use our utmost ingenuity in slandering as our utmost strength in slaughtering a self-made enemy.

NORTH-END DOMESTIC MISSION, LIVERPOOL.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Forty-sixth Annual Meeting of this Mission, which carries on its work at Hamilton-road and Bond-street, was held at the Ullet-road Church Hall on Thursday, the 11th inst. In the absence of the President, Mr. W. C. Rawlins, J.P., who was prevented by illness from being present, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers kindly took the chair.

The Committee in their report, after referring to the loss sustained by the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who had been a member of the Committee for fourteen years, expressed their satisfaction with the excellent work carried on by the Rev. J. L. Haigh at Hamilton-road, and their regret that Miss Wells should have been compelled to resign her work as lady missionary at Bond-street.

Of her influence at the Mission the report said:—"The Committee here place on record their admiration and respect for the spirit and devotion with which she gave herself to the service of the poor. Her influence, especially upon the rising generation was deep, and she leaves Bond-street with the best wishes of all who know her." And as to Bond-street it was added: "In view of the opinion expressed more than once, and by some influential subscriber, that the time has come when the Bond-street Mission might well be closed, and the whole work concentrated at Hamilton-road, your Committee gave serious and full consideration to this question. It was, however, represented by those who best know the value of the Mission and the actual state of the work, that it would be little short of a calamity to take such a step. With a mother's meeting of over eighty women, a Sunday-school with about seventy scholars over sixteen years of age, and a congregation frequently numbering seventy to eighty, it seemed impossible to abandon the neighbourhood, and your Committee, thinking it advisable that Mr. Haigh should devote all his attention to Hamilton-road, appointed the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, Mrs. Lawrence Hall, and Mr. John Hughes, managers of Bond-street, to find a suitable successor to Miss Wells. This they have as yet not succeeded in doing, but Mr. Hawkes, Mr. Haigh, and several other volunteer helpers, have kept up most of the good work, and there has been no falling off in the interest and attendance of those connected with the old Mission."

The accounts showed a debit balance of £96 7s. 7d., as compared with £122 9s. 4d. in the previous year. Annual subscriptions amounted to £384 9s. 6d., including £50 from the District Association for Hamilton-road. Donations amounted to £241 7s. 4d., and chapel collections to £57 18s. 10d. For the renovation of Hamilton-road £112 15s. had been spent. The Committee appealed for increased support to enable them to adequately carry on the work.

Letters of apology for non attendance were read from Mr. W. C. Rawlins, Mr. Alfred Booth, Rev. J. Morley Mills, and the Rev. W. G. Topping, who had removed from Bond-street to Oldbury.

The chairman then moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Lawrence Hall, and carried unanimously:

"That this meeting desires to express, on behalf of the supporters of the Mission, its sympathy with their missionary, and congratulates him on the success attained during the past year at Hamilton-road, as shown in his report. The meeting also wishes to very sincerely thank the Rev. H. W. Hawkes and the ladies and gentlemen who have helped him for carrying on the work at Bond-street in the absence of a missionary there."

The Rev. J. L. Haigh and the Rev. H. W. Hawkes replied.

The Committee's report and statement of accounts were adopted on the motion of the Rev. H. D. Roberts, seconded by Mr. Philip Holt; and on the motion of Mr. C. Sydney Jones, seconded by Mr. Cooper, the Committee and officers were appointed, with Mr. W. C. Rawlins as Chairman; Mr. Mark P. Rathbone, 26, Exchange-street East (hon. treasurer), and Mr. Kenneth Cook, 45, Parkfield-road (hon. secretary), from whom copies of the report and accounts may be obtained. A vote of thanks to the Chairman concluded the meeting.

GRANTS TO MINISTERS AND INCOME TAX.

WE noted at the time the result of the appeal as to the liabilitiy of grants from the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund to Income Tax; but as it may be useful for many of our readers to have fuller particulars for future reference we reproduce here the following passages from the report of the case of Poynting v. Faulkner in the Times of April 14:—

This was a case stated by the Income Tax Commissioners, and raised the question as to the liability of the appellant, the Rev. Charles Thomas Poynting, a Unitarian minister, to be assessed to income tax in respect of a grant to him of £50 from a fund known as the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, as being an annual profit or gain arising and accruing to the appellant from his profession or vocation as a minister under Section 2, Schedule D, of 16 and 17 Vict. c. 34.

Dr. Danckwerts, K.C., and Mr. James Austen-Cartmell appeared for the appellant; and the Attorney-General and Mr. Rowlatt for the respondent.

The appellant was the minister of the Platt Chapel, in Manchester, and the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund was constituted by a deed under which it was declared, inter alia—(1) that the fund should be vested in trustees and managed by a committee of management; (2) that the "paramount object intended to be accomplished by this fund is to encourage the faithful ministers of congregations in England statedly assembling for the public worship of God"; (3) that with a view of carrying out this object, the committee should cause the dividends of the stocks, funds, and securities for the time being constituting the capital of the fund to be applied as they in their uncontrolled discretion might think proper "for or towards the augmentation of the stipend of the ministers of such congregations aforesaid as they may from time to time select"; (5) that the committee should not make any grant except for the current year, so that the fund should not become chargeable with any sum by way of endowment, and that in distributing the income the committee should pay particular regard to the state and condition of the congregation, and to their ability to make adequate provision for their minister, and, other things being equal, should give preference to such persons as had been regularly educated for the office of the ministry; (6) that the committee should have power to make bye-laws. These bye-laws provided, inter alia, that all applications for "pecuniary assistance" should be in writing, and that the committee did not prelude themselves from making voluntary unsolicited grants. The original intentions of the founders of the fund were shown in a letter set out in the case, in which they stated that they had been painfully impressed by recent disclosures respecting "the miserable pittances given, under the name of salary, to the great majority of ministers in their body." In selecting recipients the committee took into consideration the applicant's private income as well as that received from the congregation, his age, his training, the length and value of his services in the ministry, and whether his service had been entirely at one chapel or at several, and their practice had been to augment the grant in the case of University graduates. A grant ceased with the death or resignation of the recipient, and any portion unpaid at that time was not paid at all, nor was any part ever paid to his successor, and if he moved to another place during the year in which the grant was made any unpaid balance was not paid to him.

Mr. Justice Phillimore, in giving judgment, said that no doubt it was a sine quâ non that the beneficiary should be a minister, but it was not the material reason for making the grant. In this case, as in that of Turner v. Cuxon, it had been made for personal considerations—viz. age, lack of means and past service. The appeal would be allowed, with costs.

"KNOX RANNOCH'S PROPHECY," by Mark Meldrum, is a tale of the Scottish Church crisis, written amid the scenes of that momentous conflict, by one who has the keenest interest in the progress of religious thought and life in his native land. We hope very soon to publish a notice of the story by a brother Scott. Aberdeen: Henry Munro, Bon Accord offices, 10, Crown-street. 1s., or by post 1s. 2d.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.

THE sixth annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Monday, the 22nd inst., the President, the Rev. William Harrison, in the chair. There was a good attendance. Thirteen new members were elected, bringing the total membership up to 126. Resolutions deploring the death of the Revs. T. R. Elliott and H. McKean, expressing sympathy with the Rev. E. W. Lummis in his illness, and congratulating the Rev. H. E. Dowson on his convalescence, were passed.

The annual report showed the steady numerical and financial progress of the Society, which, after six years of service, might well regard itself as having established its position and vindicated the necessity for such an organisation.

A number of members had participated in benefit while being without ministerial charge, and all the remaining members had been insured against such a contingency. Those who had no necessity to make calls on the fund would rejoice that their subscriptions had gone to help others who were less fortunate, or to build up the capital of the Society; while they might remember that, if their own need had required them to declare on the fund under the rules, the means would have been ready to help them through the co-operation of their brethren. The Settlements Bureau had been in operation since last July, and seemed likely to be of service. Its object was to bring together, with greater facility, and more regard for self-respect, congregations needing ministers, and ministers without charge, or who desired a change. Nineteen congregations and twenty ministers had placed their names on the list in eight months, and some settlements had been directly brought about in this way. Though it was still too early to pronounce any definite judgment on the merits of this scheme, so far as it had gone, it seemed to answer a need, and had certainly brought some ministers and congregations together, and given chances of a settlement which might or might not be brought about. The further development of this scheme was commended to the consideration of the members and of the congregations also. The balance-sheet showed an accumulated capital amounting to £425 15s. 10d. Representatives were appointed to a conference regarding the future use of the Memorial Hall after the Unitarian Home Missionary College has removed to its new home, and a resolution was passed expressing sympathy with any well-considered proposal that would secure the use of the building for Unitarian purposes.

The Rev. J. Crowther Hirst was elected president; the treasurer (the Rev. Dendy Agate) and secretary (the Rev. C. J. Street) were re-elected. Vacancies on the Committee were filled by the appointment of the Revs. J. M. Bass and W. E. George. Mr. A. E. Piggott, F.S.A.A., and Rev. W. R. Shanks were re-elected as auditors.

A resolution was passed requesting the Editor of the "Essex Hall Year-Book" to publish in future issues particulars of the settlements in the various congregations for the past 25 years, in view of the valuable information already tabulated about the ministers.

An open conference on the subject of ministerial settlements followed, several members taking part in the discussion.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Chorley (Induction Service).—On Saturday afternoon, May 13, a service was held in the Park-street Chapel for the induction of Mr. W. T. Bushrod as minister. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Bass, and the charge to the minister was given by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, who at the outset tendered to Mr. Bushrod his heartfelt congratulations on now having realised his desire to give his whole time and strength to the work of the ministry, which had been for many years his noble ambition. He could, from personal experience, testify to the effective aid which Mr. Bushrod had rendered as a member of the Southern Association and as a lay preacher. The congregations at Parkstone and Southampton would ever bear in memory his faithful service in their behalf, and his removal to Lancashire had left a blank in the little community in the South. Mr. Coe then proceeded to speak of the ideal of ministerial life, its temptations and its opportunities, and the Rev. Charles Roper afterwards gave an earnest charge to the congregation. In the evening, after tea in the school-room, a welcome meeting was held in the chapel, the Rev. S. Thompson, of Rivington, being in the chair. The Revs. C. Roper, J. J. Wright, and J. M. Bass also joined in the welcome. Mr. Bass said that he and Mr. Bushrod had formerly worked together in the Southampton Sunday-school, and when he himself left to go to college thirteen years ago Mr. Bushrod remained engaged in arduous business during the week, yet he had started and successfully organised a congregation and Sunday-school forty miles from where he lived. That showed there was something in him besides the resources of his physical strength; there was also mental and spiritual strength. Mr. Bushrod warmly acknowledged the welcome accorded to him.

Kings Lynn (Welcome Meeting).—On Wednesday, May 17, a meeting was held to welcome the Rev. J. Morton Barnes, B.A., as minister of the Unitarian church. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. G. Gemmell, and among those who joined in the welcome was the Rev. E. W. Bremner, a Congregational minister in the town. The Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, and others, sent messages of regret for absence. Mr. Morton Barnes spoke hopefully of the prospect of his work at Lynn.

Long Sutton, Lincolnshire.—The General Baptist Chapel was re-opened after extensive alterations and renovation on Sunday, May 21, the 205th anniversary of the chapel and the 14th of the ministry of the Rev. W. J. Pond. The changed and attractive appearance of the building gave great satisfaction to all, and the re-opening services were enthusiastic and successful. The devotional service in the afternoon was conducted by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, the preacher being the Rev. Percy Francis, of Nottingham, formerly congregational minister of Long Sutton. At the evening service Mr. Francis conducted the service. The Rev. A. J. Marchant (President of the General Baptist Assembly) preached; his subject was "Unselfish Service," Rom. xiv. 7. A communion service followed, conducted by the Rev. W. J. Pond. On the following day a tea and public meeting were held, when Mr. F. Boltz, chapel warden, presided, and addresses were delivered by the Revs. A. J. Marchant, C. Francis, F. W. Dart, W. J. Pond, and the chairman. A resolution expressive of the gratitude of the congregation to the societies and friends by whose liberal contributions the much-needed restoration has been effected, was passed with the greatest enthusiasm.

Rawtenstall.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 14, when Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth, was the special preacher. The church was full. Seats had to be placed along the aisles, and the people overcrowded into the vestry. The collection was a record one, amounting to £53 9s. 5d.

Reading.—The church has sustained a very severe loss in the death of Mrs. Walford Ridley, who passed away on Saturday week. She was an earnest supporter, taking an interest in everything for the past twenty years, and her genial presence will be much missed among the congregation.

Richmond (Welcome Meeting).—On Wednesday evening between seventy and eighty members of the congregation and their friends assembled in the Freemasons' Hall, from 7 to 8 p.m. to meet the Rev. Felix Taylor, the newly appointed minister, and Mrs. Taylor. At 8 p.m. an adjournment was made to the Free Church, Ormond-road. The chair was taken by Mr. G. H. Edwards. After an introductory hymn and prayer, led by the Rev. S. Farrington, the late minister, who gave the Rev. F. Taylor a cordial welcome, the charge to the minister was given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who was supported by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. Ellis Mace, the chairman of Mr. Taylor's late congregation at Tenterden, and Mr. Edwards. Mr. Taylor, in replying, laid particular emphasis on the need of a school hall, and the development of interests for the younger members of the congregation. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who followed, gave the charge to the congregation, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant also spoke. The benediction, pronounced by Mr. Taylor, closed the proceedings.

Stockport.—The anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, May 14, by the Rev. J. E. Manning, when there was a fair attendance morning and evening. On the previous Thursday there was a very successful café chantant held in the schools, when the music and the social evening were much enjoyed by a large gathering of members and friends.

Truth in Conflict with the Creeds

By JOHN A. BOWMAN.

FROM THE PREFACE.

"The intense interest which is manifested by all classes in the discoveries in science in the realm of physics is in strange contrast with the indifference displayed in regard to discovery in theology in the realm of spirit. Hence the doctrines of the Churches are bound up in creeds and catechisms, to the exclusion of that freedom of thought which is the highest prerogative of man."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE published last week an account of the case, "Poynting v. Faulkner," in which last April Mr. Justice Phillimore had decided that grants to ministers from the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund were not to be held liable to Income-tax. Unhappily this judgment has been reversed by the Master of the Rolls, and two other judges in the High Court of Appeal, after a hearing on May 26, 27 and 30, and such grants are now declared under Schedule D to be liable to the tax.

THE practical annihilation of the Russian fleet in the Far East, "Russia's Salamis," "Togo's Trafalgar," as it has been variously called, is stupendous in the magnitude of the disaster, and must have far-reaching consequences, not only in the progress of the actual conflict between the two powers, but in the nearer world of European politics. One can only hope that so signal a demonstration of the fruitlessness of Russia's efforts may bring the war, with its awful harvest of misery and destruction, to a speedy end. Would that it might also realise the hope of a writer in the Westminster Gazette, and, through the initiative of this country, lead to a practical step at last being taken to check the insane rivalry in naval expenditure, and reduce the crushing burden thereby laid upon European nations.

THE vision of the East End of London transformed into a place of beauty, with trees and flowers, window-gardens and leaf-clad porches, fern-covered rockeries, and wastes and embankments blooming with lilac, laburnum, and blossoming hawthorn, is a pleasant dream. Canon Barnett has hopes that it may become a reality. Virginia creepers will grow in Commercial-street, and therefore anywhere in the East End, blank walls might be covered by them and other climbing plants, playgrounds of elementary schools could be in part planted with flowers and children trained to tend them. The backs of the houses, so dreary and ugly, might be relieved or even made beautiful if each occupant did the best with his little bit of land, and instead of refuse, dust heaps, and ugly outhouses and fences, made the best of the possibility of growing trees, plants and flowers, especially if by common consent the fences were taken down and the many little scraps of ground belonging to a number of houses made into one garden to be used in common.

CANON BARNETT is promoting an exhibition, to be held at the Whitechapel Art Gallery, to show peop'e what is possible even in London, and by photographs and models to set before them what a garden suburb, such as that proposed at Hampstead, could be made by judicious planning from the first. There are to be plans and pictures of "Port Sunlight" and "Bourneville," and Mr. Horsfall, who has so recently drawn attention to the advance made in Germany in the arrangement of the residential areas of towns, is asked to provide exhibits which will make evident these advantages. But, as Canon Barnett said to a Daily News representative, "nothing can be done unless the people desire it." The effort is being made to rouse that desire and the belief that it can be fulfilled.

THE development of Letchworth (Garden City) is being promoted with energy and success. The secretary reports that there is a large increase in the number of applications for sites, and that additional manufacturers are taking up land. Share capital to the amount of about £114,000 has been subscribed. The new roads under construction are sufficiently advanced to make all points of the town area readily and pleasantly accessible, and building operations are proceeding rapidly. About 100 cottages will be erected in connection with the Cheap Cottages Exhibition, which will be held from July 15 to Sept. 30, and many of these are now in course of erection. The directors are arranging for visits of various societies of people whose judgment and interest in the scheme are of special value. On May 31 the Worshipful Company of Gardeners made their visit, and "named" the open space adjoining the North-road.

IN connection with the unemployed problem it is pleasant to note that the directors of Garden City provided work for about 350 men under the auspices of the Mansion House Committee, during February, March, April, and May, and that they are able to report that this was done "without any loss to the Company." They expect to give further employment in the same manner during next winter. The buildings erected for their accommodation will be used as administrative and other buildings in connection with the Cheap Cottages Exhibition.

AMONG the several items of Quaker information which have recently come to our notice, we cannot pass by without a word the interesting change by which the sittings of yearly meeting have this year, for the first time, taken place upon other benches than the familiar ones at Devonshire House. They have been held from the 25th to the 31st ult., at Leeds, and if we may judge from the reports already to hand, the recent awakening of Yorkshire Quakerism has there been making itself felt.

NOT contented with the steady student's work continually going forward at Woodbrooke, near Birmingham, the Friends' Summer School Continuation Committee announces three gatherings to be held during the summer and autumn at Reigate, Sidcot, and Scalby, intended to meet the needs of friends in the south-eastern, south-western, and northern districts respectively. The Sidcot Summer School, which is to meet among the Mendips from Aug. 24 to Sept. 4, promises to be a stimulating and refreshing time. Among its lecturers are Professor McGiffert, of New York, Dr. Rufus Jones, editor of The American Friend, and among the few who have added anything of permanent value in recent years to Quaker apologetics, and Mr. B. Kirkman Gray. Mr. Gray, who has just contributed a chapter on the history of unemployment to the volume on that subject issued by the Christian Social Brotherhood, and is lecturing in the autumn before the London School of Economics, is giving four lectures on the "History of Philanthropy," which should prove particularly interesting to a gathering of Quakers.

A FAREWELL presentation was made to Dr. Agar Beet at Richmond Wesleyan College on Friday week, on his retirement from the Theological chair. There was a large gathering of past and present students and friends of the College. Dr. Beet resigned his chair because permission had been refused to him to republish his book on the "Last Things," a book which he had previously withdrawn from circulation, as a concession to the feelings of others, and to maintain peace in the Church. He was convinced of the truth of his teaching in that book, and could not permit it to be permanently destroyed; hence he had been compelled to take that step. He exhorted the students to get convictions of their own, convictions fought out in the struggle of their own thought, and to do their best to bring those convictions into harmony with truth. Dr. Beet intends, it is said, to settle at Richmond, and engage in literary work.

THE Dean of Winchester, as one of the hundred and one clergy of the Church of England who invited the signatures of their brethren at home and abroad to the Declaration on Biblical Criticism (publish in THE INQUIRER of May 13, p. 294), has issued a letter of report and explanation on the subject. 30,000 copies of the Declaration were posted to the clergy at home and abroad during March and April, the work being intentionally suspended during the Easter days; but to their great regret the document was made public by some unauthorised person on the eve of Good Friday. The returns are not yet complete, although no doubt the majority of answers to be expected have been received. Up to the present, 1,694 of the clergy have signed the Declaration, of whom 322 are in the colonies and abroad, and 1,372 in Great Britain and Ireland. The Bishops were not asked to sign, but a copy of the Declaration, with a short summary of the results of the canvass and a plea for consideration, has now been sent to each Bishop. "This quiet mode of presentation," says Dr. Furneaux, "is deemed "to be better than deputations and "speeches. The 'authoritative encouragement' from the rulers of the "Church, petitioned for in the Declaration, does not imply any formal pronouncement, single or corporate, in "answer to the signatories; what, with "deference, is desired and sought is "merely that our Fathers in God, when "they publicly advise upon the subject, "should not deprecate thorough and "reverent investigation into the New "Testament records, but should commend "it as a duty, an enlightenment, and a "safeguard."

THE Dean then adds the following comment:—"The Declaration has been "subjected to grave misunderstanding and censure; it has been supposed to 'attack' this or that doctrine, "and has been, we believe with sincere "and misguided aim, amplified or distorted by unwarrantable assumptions. "Many questions of interpretation, too, "have been addressed to the committee. "To these animadversions and inquiries "only a general answer can be made. "The signatories of the Declaration hold "strictly to the document. It attacks "nothing. That is not its purpose. Its "purpose is positive, not negative. It "calls attention to a momentous intellectual movement of our times, named "Biblical Criticism. In relation thereto "it takes up two positions. (1) It "asserts that it is both unwise and "dangerous to shrink from applying to "the New Testament, as the historical "basis of Christianity, the processes of "critical inquiry that have already, with "advantage to faith and with general "assent, been applied to the Old Testament; and that there is within the "Church a legitimate and even necessary "place for reverent, frank, and dispassionate discussion of the problems to which "the criticism of the New Testament "gives rise. (2) The Declaration maintains that, whatever be the issue of "criticism, the faith of the Church will "stand unmoved. Though no man, looking a generation or two ahead, can "foresee the results of criticism, or can "say to the critical movement, 'Thus "far shalt thou go, and no farther,' "still the Declaration holds that the "faith of the Church will remain "strengthened and secure. The signatories varying indefinitely in their expectations from the final critical decision—most of them probably cherishing a strong conservative forecast, "others herein less sanguine—all are at "one in this vital belief. If any clergy, "desiring to add their names, have not yet "signed, they are asked to send, without "delay, to the Declaration Committee, "8, Henrietta-street, Cavendish-square, "London, W. If any clergy regret their "signatures, there is still time for withdrawal."

TUESDAY'S Standard devoted a whole column to a thoughtful and appreciative review of Mr. Carpenter's new book on Dr. Martineau, of whom the writer spoke as "in the personal sense, one of the "greatest religious and philosophical "forces" of the nineteenth century, at least in England. "It is too early," he says, "to determine Martineau's ultimate "place as an exponent of the Philosophy "of Religion, or to settle the question of "what the world owes to him in the interpretation of Moral Theory. But the "beauty of his life, the high plane of "thought on which all his speculations "moved, and the habitual reverence of his "outlook on the tremendous issues of "human conduct, leap to light impressively "on almost every page. We get also "glimpses here and there of his intellectual "friendships with men who differed widely "from him, and occasionally we come across "literary judgments which gather into a "single forceful phase the ripe conclusions "of not merely an original, but a disciplined and tolerant mind."

IN another passage of his review the writer says:—"James Martineau was a "man of fascinating personality, and his "whole life was inspired, in no conventional "application of the term, by the passion "for righteousness. Broadly tolerant "though he was of intellectual differences, "his ethical sensitiveness made him regard "with what seemed to some people a touch "of austerity anything which seemed to "tend toward moral laxity. In the interpretation of religion his place was with "Butler rather than with Newman. Like "all deeply spiritual men, in spite of what "he regarded as the sweet reasonableness "of his creed, he was at heart a mystic, "and his philosophy had little in common "with some modern types of rationalism. "Mr. Carpenter claims with truth that "both Martineau's ethics and metaphysics "were built on the experiences of his inner "history, and furnish a clue to the whole "fabric of his thought."

THE treasurer of the Brahmo Boys' Boarding and Day School, 31, Jhapum kur-lane, Calcutta, gratefully acknowledges a donation of £10 from Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, received through the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, in response to the appeal which was published in THE INQUIRER of January 14.

WE have been interested to receive the seventh annual report of "The John Pounds Home for Girls," now called "The John Pounds Cottage." It was opened in March, 1898, as a Home where very poor girls, or those in great moral danger, could be received for training for domestic service, provided with an outfit, and placed in suitable situations. It will be remembered that last year it was found desirable to remove the Home to a much smaller house, to be carried on upon somewhat different lines. The girls are kept for a shorter time, care being taken to place them in situations where they are well looked after, and their training continued. The present address of the Home is 8, Netley-terrace, Southsea, which, as to size and situation, seems very suitable. The year's record shows that good work is being done. Mrs. Rogers, of 28, Osborne-road, Southsea, continues to act as Hon. Secretary, and the Treasurer is Mr. E. J. Cooper, 120, Laburnham-grove, North-end, Portsmouth.

THE annual meeting of the Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers was held at 56, Old Bailey, E.C., on Tuesday, May 30, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., presiding. The report shows that seventy-four aged and infirm ministers have been aided during the past year, the total amount expended in grants being £852. These figures show a slight advance on those of the previous year. Special reference was made in the report to the resignation by Mr. Philip Cadby of the office of treasurer, which he has filled honourably and efficiently for thirty-six years. Mr. W. Lepard Smith, of Watford, was appointed to the vacant office. Subscriptions or donations in aid of the Society will be thankfully received by Mr. W. Lepard Smith, or by the Secretary, the Rev. P. G. Scorey, of 10, Hartington Villas, Hove, Brighton.

THE good mind dignifies every employment. It is the men who make the situations mean. A high and holy aim, a pure and good heart ennobles every position; even the gibbet is ennobled when it bears a Christ.—George Brown.

LITERATURE.

PROFESSORIAL THEOLOGY.*

THE three volumes named below well deserve attention, though a few paragraphs only can be assigned to them here. Two of them are by writers who have passed from the present school-house of experience; the author of one is happily still with us, yielding good fruit to his religious brethren and the reading public generally. To speak of this book first, we must confess some disappointment with it. It is, indeed, written with a scholarly distinction and an earnestness befitting the subject. The exposition of the Old Testament writings brought under special notice is patiently and lucidly done, the author having evidently in mind not so much the experts as the simple people of ordinary intelligence, though here and there the elaboration natural to a "professor" shows itself, as in the study of Habakkuk. Specially worthy of a word of gratitude is the author's discriminating criticism of the various positions occupied by successive psalmists with regard to the "Problem of Suffering." He recognises that "rare spirits" escape the hardest pressure of this problem through their "inner certainty of God"; but he holds that ordinary humanity needs "an assurance of God's love that will triumph over the facts which deny it," and this assurance he finds in "the doctrine that God is love, made possible by God's existence as a Trinity, and proved by God's sacrifice of His Son." To Professor Peake this refuge seems not only adequate, but necessary. We can only say that if we must first accept a mysterious and perplexing theory as to the Godhead before we can be brave to bear our pains and strong to hope that even the worst has some soul of goodness in it, we shall be in a bad way.

The second volume before us is one more addition to the rather bulky collection of the late Professor A. B. Davidson's posthumous books. It is confessedly lacking in symmetry and adjustment, being compiled from the materials of courses of lectures delivered to students at different times. The alumni of theological colleges might profitably add the volume to the old stock of notes taken during their years of study; such readers, at any rate, will know just the worth of this patient plodding through discussions which, while centred in points seemingly of minute importance, are really of much importance themselves alike as a discipline and for the accumulated results which emerge at the end. The book shows once more the qualities of the mind that produced it, faithful pursuit of truth and deep sympathy with the human side of the Biblical literature. Of course he held that this literature distinctly led up to the introduction of the kingdom of God, in its fullest sense, by the advent of the Son of God into the world; but the tone characterising the book is far from dogmatic. It is obviously not a book for a large public; but students will find it most valuable as a storehouse of illuminating information and suggestion.

The third book before us is, in many ways, far the most striking in subject, and certainly most ably written. It consists of a course of six lectures delivered so long ago as 1892, in Edinburgh, as the Croall Lecture. The delay in its publication probably gave opportunity for careful revision by the author himself; the editor, the Rev. W. Fulton, one of his students, has evidently given much useful supervision to the work. The theme discussed is practically what is usually called "Calvinism," though the application of that term is deprecated, with good reason, by the author. He prefers to hold to the title "The Reformed Church," as indicating a broader philosophical movement than was due even to Calvin's great influence. His adoption of the historical method of expounding the system of thought under consideration is welcome as a sign that everywhere the principle of the growth of thought is being recognised, and the necessity is admitted of observing the conditions amid which that growth has taken place. Dr. Hastie opens with a pronounced challenge to Ritschlianism as a "system of religious agnosticism"; his criticisms are pointed and often as fully pregnant, but he clearly failed to appreciate the reasons for the modesty of the current German movement in regard to transcendental theology. Its champions might well ask whether the "Reformed Theology," however modified and softened it may be in its modern form, does not claim to know more than it really does. In his second lecture, Dr. Hastie administers a correction to the opinion which some of us have commonly held. He says Protestantism, rightly understood, is neither the right of private judgment, rationalism, nor "subjectivity" in religion. It is a church-reforming principle, its essential feature being the "immediacy of the religious relation." The precise difference between this feature and that of "subjectivity" is not clear to us. After distinguishing the effects of this principle upon current church life at large, the author enunciates afresh the cardinal doctrine of the "Reformed Theology," viz., the "Divine Sovereignty." The reader must go for himself to the closely-packed pages of the book in order to appreciate the manly grip of the author's unflinching argument. Nothing but "Absolute Predestination" appears to him at once thinkable and comforting. Of course, writing at the end of the nineteenth century he could not fail to draw upon the resources supplied by natural science and recent philosophy to the argument for determinism; those who are curious to know how the spirit of religion, profound and vigorous, can subsist along with a fatalist scheme of the universe will not easily find a better example than here. All we can afford to quote is a concluding paragraph, which follows an examination of the grounds upon which objections are raised against the predestination doctrine. Having stated that this principle repudiates both the theory of "conditional immortality" which does not leave everything entirely to God's grace, and the "common universalism, in so far as it is grounded on a mere feeling of benevolence and issues in a simple identity in sameness of condition in the future world," the author says:

"But at the same time, in view of the "enlarging evidence of the unity of the "divine purpose and its progressive realisation in all its spheres, the principle "can rest no longer in the old traditional "dualism and particularism, with the "final termination of the whole process of "the world in an eternal hell, whose tortured denizens are for ever separated "from God and heaven. The ideal of the "Reformed eschatology is an endless progression in the future life under conditions modified by the results of the present development, and carrying that "development forward under new conditions of divine determination. Although "a decree of eternal reprobation seems "incompatible with the universal Principle "of Absolute Predestination in God as "the absolutely good, yet a relative election and preterition" [passing by] "in "time with even an ultimate differencing "of the spiritual lives of all the individuals "of mankind, is not inconsistent with it. "The failures and defects of the present "development of the individual may "assert themselves in a retardation of "his development in eternity, and in a "continued sense of imperfection and "incompleteness. In all its cycles "and æons the development may still "retain more or less of the elements of "struggle and pain. Neither the idea "of a mere general restoration nor that "of a universal forgiveness satisfies "the deeper principle of the Reformed "system, which demands the absolute "maintenance of the law of righteousness, "and a finally complete differentiation of "all the possible stages and degrees of the "spiritual life."

Thus the strong and fearless mind struggles in the meshes of this terrible imagination—"a sovereignty" which, as it would appear, either cannot or will not reveal itself in benevolence in every creature. Yet, observe the new light. The author adds:—

"The Reformed Theology has not yet "fully solved this profoundest problem "of all, but it is passing in this connection "through a new period of vital development. And the issue shall be a deepened belief in the endless development "of all created souls till the absolute "purpose of God shall be realised in an "infinitely diversified spirit-world, reconciled, perfected, and unified in eternal "harmony through spiritual communion "with Christ around the throne of God."

So speaks the ancient "Calvinism" to-day.

W. G. TARRANT.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

ON LIVING A DAY AT A TIME.

"Be not therefore anxious for the morrow: for the morrow will be anxious for itself."

"Take no thought for the morrow."—JESUS.

One day at a time! Every heart that aches
Knows only too well how long that can seem;
But it's never to-day which the spirit breaks:
It's the darkened future without a gleam.

ANON.

THERE is a story told of a lady who, threatened with tedious suffering, asked her doctor how long she would be disabled by it. His answer was both wise and kind. "Madam," he said, "just a day at a time."

How the words must have shortened the dreary perspective for her, and brightened with suggested hope the future so full of pain and fear. And is it not strictly true of every life, if we would but face the fact, that it is only for a day at a time? Merry or sad, full of activities, or lonely in bed-ridden helplessness, important to half a world or seemingly useless—in all cases and under all circumstances our lives are given to us a day at a time. And we know nothing at all of what even that day may bring forth.

So it is good philosophy to live a day at a time. We can do no more. Nothing in heaven above or in the earth beneath can be helped forward by our anxious thought for the morrow. Our Lord did not minimise the fact that the burden of to-morrow lies there within to-morrow—if we live to see it; sufficient is that burden for the new day's strength. But it is unwise, and in one believing in the Fatherhood of God it is unfilial folly to add to-morrow's burden to to-day's. By doing that we unfit ourselves for rightly bearing either. Haven't we all found that at the bottom of some irritable outburst which we deeply regretted there lay not only the fatigue of to-day's work, but the worry about the days or weeks to come? Many of the sharp words that now wound loving souls would be left unsaid, much of the misery and illness of life would be non-existent if all who love God would trust Him as fully for their children and friends as for themselves; and as fully for their temporal as for their spiritual good. Have we not all felt at some time or other that the clearness of brain, and the calmness of nerve which were necessary to success in come crisis were not ours to command, because we had worried beforehand? We see it exemplified every day that "it's not work that kills, but worry"; for some of the hardest workers the world has ever seen have lived to a green old age. They were too busy to meet trouble half way. Some of the greatest workers and some of the greatest sufferers are the most cheerful souls alive. They bend all their energies to do and to accept the will of God in this hour; for the next they trust to Him. Our Lord's illustrations of his text are startling in their thoroughness. You fear that you or the children will want food? "Behold, the birds of heaven that they sow not, neither do they reap. . . . and your Heavenly Father feedeth them." The birds do their own work, which is God's will for them; and meanwhile God's sunshine and His rain are ripening and swelling the harvest—for the birds: From out the immensities of the wide universe, in which twenty million suns range in ample spaces, come the materials for a sparrow's feast, or for the petals of a lily. And Jesus adds—we may fancy with what a tender, humorous smile—"Are ye not of much more value than they?"

Let us believe in the mercy that veils the future. We are the children of God. He knows; He is all-powerful; He is love. It is ours to trust Him. He knows the limits of our powers of endurance. How many times have we not had reason to say, "If I had known all that lay before me, I could never have gone through it." It is perfectly true. A great element in our power to bear was that each blow, each pang, came separately, unforeseen; and, with the indomitable sub-conscious hopefulness of the human soul, we thought each calamity would be the last. Our Heavenly Father understands how our eyes would tire of looking down long vistas, that our feet lag more heavily if the track we climb hangs too full in sight far up the mountain side, and that our hearts would become as water within us if we knew beforehand how fierce the battle would be or how long the imprisonment. I remember that one Sunday morning in a strange city I was going to chapel down an extremely long straight road. We had been house-moving, and I was dreadfully tired. Suddenly, friends whom I supposed to be going to the chapel I sought passed us in a carriage, and in a moment were far down the road. The sight of the distance took my last morsel of strength and courage, and, "I cannot go on," I cried. "I hoped we were nearer than that." In truth we were close to the chapel, for our friends worshipped a mile away. So it is in our lives continually. We disquiet ourselves in vain because we pry too far into futurities we may never be called to traverse. The hot road and the long pilgrimage may not be for us. But only the shade of a lime tree and a rest in our Father's house. We should be shocked at the idea of fortune-telling, or of seeking through witches to peer into the coming time; but we allow our imaginations to conjure up disasters and tragedies in a way which is just as dishonouring to God. And, all the while, it is because He knows us so well and loves us so truly that there are so many turns in the road, and all beyond is hidden. Let us learn from our hearts to say, with Miss Waring:

Father, I know that all my life
Is portioned out for me,
And the changes that are sure to come
I do not fear to see;
But I ask Thee for a present mind,
Intent on pleasing Thee."

MARY RALPH.

EARTH shall be near to heaven when all
That severs man from man shall fall;
For here, or there, salvation's plan
Alone is love of God and man.

J. G. Whittier.

THE great secret of all peace lies in the ascendency of some strong love. Love—the admiring or reverent direction of the heart on some object—is the positive power of our life; and on its free action, on its due match against the problems it undertakes, depend the tranquillity and unity of existence.—Martineau.

GHEEL.

FEW visitors to Belgium turn aside from the beaten track to pay a visit to the quaint old town of Gheel. This is not to be wondered at, for Gheel has simply no attractions for the ordinary tourist. To be interested in Gheel one must be interested in a subject which is regarded by many with horror, the subject of insanity; for Gheel was the pioneer in a treatment of insanity which the civilised world is gradually adopting.

France, Germany, Russia, Holland, Scotland, have not been too proud to learn their lessons from the quiet little Belgian town. Next it will be England's turn. To the injury and loss of thousands of afflicted creatures England has been a laggard in this matter. It is time she woke up.

To a saintly princess from Ireland, the Island of Saints, Gheel owes its fame. A thirteenth century chronicler, Petrus Cameracensis, tells her tragic story: an old tragedy even then, for she dates from the seventh century. How the fair maiden became a Christian; how threatened by her father she fled, first to Antwerp, and then to Gheel; how he at length discovered her hiding-place; how her patient firmness roused his insane fury, and he plunged his sword into the heart of his child; all this the ancient chronicler relates. And then a miracle, after many years! The bones of the murdered princess in a sarcophagus of dazzling whiteness and of angelic workmanship are discovered and placed in what is to-day the Church of St. Dymphna, and very soon there are miraculous healings of the insane and weak-minded who are brought to the shrine. Pilgrims flock to the little town, and, with their insane patients, are received into the houses of the inhabitants. This goes on for centuries. Some attempts to regulate it are made in the fifteenth century when a kind of asylum is built as an annexe to the church.

But not until the middle of the nineteenth century were the abuses which arose from the influx of people in all stages of insanity seriously grappled with. Then, in 1856, the Communal Government appointed a medical superintendent to take charge of the colony. To cleanse the system from its superstitious and priestly adjuncts, and render it what it is to-day, a model of humane and enlightened treatment of insanity by boarding-out patients, was no light task. Much of the credit is due to Dr. Bulkens who ruled the colony, as medical superintendent, until 1876, though great improvements have been made since that date. The number of patients at present in the colony is nearly two thousand. About half of these live in the town, and the other half are accommodated in detached farms and small hamlets. There is a very systematic and minute inspection of each case. The patients are treated as members of the family, and share in all the wholesome influences and interests of healthy family life. Their environment is similar to what they have been accustomed to, the non-paying patients, who form the great majority, being located with small farmers, tradesmen, or working people.

And what of the results? These are wonderful. The loss of life by consumption, which carries off so many inmates of our large asylums, is reduced to just about one-half, and this despite the well-known fact that the patients suitable for boarding out belong to the very class in which the disease is most common, viz., dements, chronic maniacs, imbeciles and epileptic cases. Though cases of acute mania and violent excitement are excluded, an authority states it as a fact "that many patients who have been somewhat excitable and inclined to violence in the asylums, and about whose entire suitability for family life doubts have been entertained, have become calm and tractable under the soothing domestic influences of the families in which they were placed. Experience shows that many more cases than might be expected do well under family care." It is not really to be wondered at, for this is nature's method. It is not to be wondered at that the percentage of deaths is very much lower and of real recoveries very much higher. It is what one might expect.

The method of incarcerating thousands of insane people in huge institutions, thus placing them in abnormal conditions and in an unnatural environment, is a method both costly and stupid. For the majority of patients it is entirely unnecessary, and indeed a cruel injustice. Other civilised nations have learned this from Gheel. When will England wake up?

XXI.

I SHOULD not like to be called upon to give a just definition of the word "enthusiasm." If I followed the dictionaries, I might give it the best sense, or the worst, as I pleased; or I might take some half-way meaning, which was never its real intention. Enthusiasm would then be sublime possession, or sheer fanaticism, or a harmless craze, as I happened to choose; there is really no criterion by which to decide; the word has veered from pole to pole, and refuses to be fixed. Nor do I know my own feeling about it; for, if I were willing to be thought enthusiastic, I should still demur to the name enthusiast. For the sake of common charity I could wish these, and all other indeterminate terms, well banished from common use.

At the beginning of the seventeenth century, enthusiasm ranked with inspiration as a true feeling of the divine presence; before the end of that period enthusiasm was the name for such feeling, when it was assumed that it could only be false. To the author of "Enthusiasmus Triumphatus" it was nothing else but a "misconceit of being inspired." Locke, whose mind had been sorely vexed by the irregularities of the sects under the Commonwealth, saw in enthusiasm only the "ungrounded fancies of a man's own brain." Swift, like Butler before him, spent some of his keenest wit upon it. The Spectator was not slow to carry satire into abuse. Its readers were assured that enthusiasm was devotion unchecked by reason (as Locke had already said); that the sects which fell short of the Church of England were strongly tinctured with it; there was no more melancholy object than a man whose head was thus turned; he was an obstinate clown, and sank below the beasts that perished. "Enthusiasm" was the word ready to hand when Methodism raised its head some thirty years later. "Religious delusion," "a spirit propagated by knaves, and embraced by fools"—this was now its only meaning. It was the dread of "enthusiasm" that closed the pulpits of the Church to the new apostles. How Wesley felt the sting of the word may be seen in his two letters to the author of "The Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists compared." In spoken sermon and printed appeal he never ceased to protest against the "uncouth," "question begging" term. For himself, he was as anxious to disclaim the title "enthusiast" as his enemies were to fasten it upon him; he was as much an enthusiast, he declared, as he was a centaur.

The slur of "enthusiasm" fell upon the Evangelicals who followed in the wake of Methodism. Hannah More, in one of her works, devotes many pages to an attempt to distinguish enthusiasm from fanaticism. She says, aptly enough, that, to the unbeliever, even the minimum of religious belief must seem fanatical; but she passes over the fact that what was then in disfavour was not so much the profession of belief as the exhibition of emotion. A generation later, everyone knew what was meant when the preface of The Christian Year opened with the statement that a sober standard of feeling was only of less consequence than a sound rule of faith. Between cold intellectualism and perfervid sentimentalism, sobriety was to be itself that standard.

If boy and man are one, then I have trodden enchanted ground, for I have spoken with Pusey and Newman, and I know the quiet lanes where Keble walked. I have seen Church in that leafy solitude from which Gladstone drew him. I have crossed the paths of men and women whose praise is in the Memoirs of the Movement, and of many more, now unknown, whose characters were moulded by it. One quality belonged to them all. It was not reserve, for this may go with pride; nor restraint, for this may go with ambition; rather was it a shrinking from self-obtrusion, a timid unwillingness to shine. Pale evening stars they were, half-seen; children of the bridegroom, with lamps well trimmed, but turning the light from them, children also of the night. To them enthusiasm was self-disclosure, too much akin to self-display, and ill according with the calm and noiseless methods of the divine action. Their own poet well interpreted the Tractarian mind when he wrote:—

A still small voice
Steals on the ear, to say, Jehovah's choice
Is ever with the soft, meek, tender soul.
By soft, meek, tender ways He loves to draw
The sinner, startled by His ways of awe:
Here is our Lord, and not where thunders roll.

"God is not in the fire." Yet this, like many another truth, may be pressed too far. There is a stillness in which it is good to possess the soul, and there is a disquiet by which it is sometimes better that the soul should be possessed. Such possession will always appear to be aberration. To a Festus, a Paul must seem "beside himself." Est Deus in nobis. As the Spirit moves, so will men be moved, and the abnormal will not then be less spiritual than the normal. The tendency to make too much of feeling is not enthusiasm, but emotionalism and sobriety is a good corrective for effusiveness, but sobriety itself may need correction when it becomes impassive propriety.

It is the fate of lofty words to fall to lower use. A popular favourite is received with enthusiasm, displays the mysteries of his art in a ravishing way, throws his audience into ecstasies of delight, and is rapturously applauded. This is the language of the spirit turned into a vocabulary for sense. Better, perhaps, would it have been if it had never been framed, for in the highest region of emotion there is no speech, or, if there are words in that third heaven, they are "unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter."

THE RELIGION OF EXPERIENCE.*

THERE are two agencies by means of which the higher or spiritual aspects of life are disclosed. The first is that of the pure thinker; the clear platonic vision of the mind detached from the harassing routine of ordinary life, and unshaken by the tragedies which convulse society. The deliverances of such minds are liable to be, like their authors, aloof and abstract; but therein lies their value. They have a chance of being unbiassed and comprehensive.

There is another class who win the significance of life in a very different way. It consists of those who have lived with reality, and so found out what is real; who have won the prize, not by force of intellect so much as by force of heart and will. Truth, like a by-product of physiological function, is found to be secreted during the expenditure of moral energy. The design of life is picked out by degrees by stumbling through it as well almost, and far more frequently than by the prior imagination of the ideal it stands for, or by the ascent of a staircase of convincing evidence, which makes the grounds of belief sure at every step. To such a conscientious stumbler life presents itself as one great field of discipline. Such a man will cease to keep account of things done except as landmarks in spiritual progress, and for that purpose it might happen, and sometimes does happen, that it is best to relinquish the hard-won possession or pull down the result of arduous labour. The question which lies at the base of every department of life is that of the spiritual advancement which it is calculated to promote. It is relevant to ask the question, "What is the use of anything made an end in itself—of education, discipline, or apprenticeship, of meditation, prayer or service, of poetry, or coins or strength?" And the answer is that "In themselves not one of them has real value; but in their exercise they may have utmost and illimitable use when, as tools, they are handled by Love."

When this view of life has taken hold of a man, certain conclusions are likely to follow. First, he will accept the world as the most perfect school of progressive discipline which divine ingenuity and farsight could provide. Next, he will accept his training at its own price, grumbling not at the expense, be it in material resources, in the wrestlings of perplexed thought, or in the purgings of his heart. And so, at last, he will expunge the word "defeat" from the vocabulary. Defeat is an expression of external significance only. It does not apply to the sanctuaries of the soul, which has the sublime power of assimilating everything, of converting physical weakness into spiritual strength, and the disaffection of cherished ideals into reserves of moral passion. To have come hither at all, to have served at the post of mortal need in however humble a fashion—this is the momentous event in the history of every individual soul. To go hence, closing the book of days, and leaving it for the next reader, conscious of being wiser for its reading, that is clear gain for humanity at large as well as for the individual immediately concerned. For, if our view of existence be the true one, our best heritage to the race is not what we have done, but what we have been.

Only this process cannot be effected on an island of egotism whose population numbers one. The spiritual making of man is in no sense insular. It is a continental affair, in which geographical frontiers vanish, and all the selfish tariffs that sever the interests of man from man are condemned as obsolete. Thus the process of self-refinement emerges into that of self-effacement. Chastity finds itself spelt with the four letters of love, and the man who was carving steps to a throne ends in discovering that his throne is the footstool on which he is bidden to wash the feet of his fellows. All this, of course, suggests one historic name, one sublime personality who was the embodiment of individual worth, of social service, and of faith in unseen things.

The place of Christ in the mind of one whose purpose is to find life by living, is in line with the rest of his experience. To read about Christ and study his life, to accept the pompous and prolific deliverances of the Church about him, to glorify and worship him, all this is one thing; but it is not in itself of necessity enough to seriously affect the man to whom human life and its environment, both material and spiritual, imply a continuous divine method of man-making. "No," says he, "my Christ must be my own; just as much my own as the Christhood of Jesus was his own—the measure of his own moral ideal, the assertion of his reliance on the Eternal and the pledge of his loving service of his fellow men. I, too, must have ideal experience and trust in the unseen; I, too, must serve, and only as in these respects I rise above the world can I make any use of such a term as 'Christ,' the 'Power of Christ,' or the 'Possession of Christ,' to describe my relationship to Jesus of Nazareth. My Christ is the Christ of experience. If either through his influence, or independently of him, I can succeed in seeing life as he saw it, and face the duties and trials of my lot from the same point of attack as he, then my spiritual experience has come into line with his, and he is a reality to me. I am his, and he is mine." This is to know Christ, and to be a follower of him in human service, dwelling in the conviction of his human nature, of the benign purpose of God, and of the open fellowship of man with him.

The foregoing remarks were suggested by the perusal of Mr. J. M. Blake's little book, "A Reasonable View of Life"; a confession of faith of the kind that is brought about, not by the vanity of book making, nor from credulous compliance with authority or tradition, nor by academic speculation, but by living and testing on the daily gauge of vicissitude the noblest ideals which seek a dwelling in a calm and resolute mind.

OBITUARY.

MRS. ELIZABETH TURNER.

THERE passed away on May 25 one who will be affectionately remembered by many ministers settled up and down the country as they recall their student days. When Manchester New College was located in London the pulpit at the ancient village of Ditchling, Sussex, was mainly supplied by its students, who received the warm-hearted hospitality of members of the congregation. Prominent among these was Mrs. Elizabeth Turner, for many years of Newlands, Keymer, and since the death of her second husband about ten years ago, of Lexden, and, still more recently, of Nuthurst, Ditchling. During the last decade the services have been principally conducted by laymen, and it is of this period only that the writer can personally speak. Although bordering on her eightieth year when he first knew her, Mrs. Turner was still active and bright, and her loyalty to the Church of her faith and motherly interest in those who ministered to her spiritual needs were very winning.

Of her virtues as parent and neighbour it would be hardly becoming to speak, but she was one of whom it may be truly said, "Her children rise up and call her blessed; she stretched out her open hand to the poor, yea, she reached forth her hands to the needy; her husband was known at the gates where he sat among the elders of the land; and on her tongue was the law of kindness."

Those who saw her during her last lingering illness, and witnessed the sweet smile on her face, could not but feel that as the vision of the earthly faded, her soul was conscious of the growing glories of the world to come. Her release came shortly after the completion of her 87th year.

The interment took place on Tuesday last in the chapel burying ground, in the presence of a numerous assembly of relatives and friends, the officiating minister being the Rev. E. Daplyn, who once had charge of the chapel for a period.

There remain to mourn her loss, two daughters by her first marriage (the Misses Elizabeth and Ellen Cooke), and a step-daughter (Miss Ellen Turner). While more than one type of faith is represented in the household, its members are united in hospitable and benevolent activities. A special word of recognition is due to Miss Ellen Cooke for her services during many years as secretary to the Ditchling congregation, which has known all the difficulties common to our country chapels.

WINIFRED HOUSE:

INVALID CHILDREN'S CONVALESCENT NURSING HOME. — ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held on Monday last, May 29, at University Hall, Gordon-square, and was presided over by Mr. J. WARRINGTON HAWARD, F.R.C.S., chairman of the Invalid Children's Aid Association. There was a rather larger attendance than usual, and the proceedings were followed with great interest.

Mr. W. M. BLYTH, hon. treasurer, read the financial statement, which showed a slight increase in the amount received in subscriptions, though the donations were rather below the average. The ordinary expenditure for this, the fourteenth year, was £800; besides this, the rebuilding of a chimney had cost £25. As the receipts of the year, together with the balance in hand at its commencement, only amounted to £811, it had been found necessary to sell out £150 from the £500 invested in order to cover the deficiency and to provide a sum for current expenses.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD, hon. sec., then read the annual report, which began with a reference to the death of her co.-hon. sec., Mr. Robert Hampson, whose warm interest in the work had been so abundantly manifested up to the time of his death. An excellent portrait of him had been presented to the Home by Mr. Arnold B. Hampson.

During the fourteen years' work 517 children had been received at Winifred House, the length of stay varying from weeks to years, according to individual needs. In the past year forty-nine children had been tended, the average number of beds in constant use having been about seventeen. Three boys had become "walking ones" during the last six months, after lying down for one and a-half, three, and four years respectively, and four more have lately left off their splints, being the first step towards the same happy consummation.

The work had gone on most satisfactorily during the year, and without the advent of epidemic or other alarming incident. Attention was called to the excellent result attained by the contributors to the Young Days Cot Fund, who, this year, had not only raised the £25 for their subscription, but had added thereto a donation of nearly £15; and the thanks of the committee were given to the Rev. J. J. Wright, the editor of Young Days, as well as to the numerous boys and girls who had sent contributions.

Winifred House had also been rich in gifts of clothes, flowers, fruit, toys, &c. The children are clothed during their stay, and the burden of almost the whole of this expense has been lifted out of the general funds by the valuable help of friends all over the country. Ladies desiring to know about patterns, or as to what garments are most needed, are requested to write to Miss E. Bertha Pritchard, 3, Pond-street, Hampstead, N.W. The report concluded with congratulating Miss Emma Hope, the lady superintendent, on having so successfully completed the seventh year of her reign.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the report; and, speaking from long personal experience of the maladies of children, he testified to the extreme importance of such Homes as these, where the little patients are not only carefully nursed and fed, but where they are kept a sufficient length of time to enable them to become really permanently benefited. He had known the working of the Home from its commencement, and the numbers of children who had been sent from the I.C.A.A. was ample evidence of the high estimation in which they held the work of Winifred House. He (Mr. Haward) gave a very pretty description of a visit that he and his wife had lately paid to to the Home; and he laid great stress on the airiness of all the rooms, and on the atmosphere of cheerfulness that pervaded the whole of the household.

Mrs. BLYTH, who knew the work well from both sides, both as a member of committee and as one interested in many of the children sent, seconded the resolution; pointing out, more especially, the important results obtained in cases of very delicate children; instancing three such, daughters of widows, whom she had sent to Winifred House some years ago. From being extremely weakly they became quite healthy, and she was then able to place them in training Homes, where they had become really effective workers, a thing which otherwise would have been quite impossible.

This resolution having been carried unanimously, a message of sympathy with Mrs. Hampson on the death of her husband was moved by Mr. ION PRITCHARD, and warmly seconded by all present.

The re-election of the hon. officers and committee was agreed upon on the motion of Mr. JOHN HARRISON and Mr. ALFRED WILSON; and a vote of thanks proposed by Mr. T. P. YOUNG, and seconded by Dr. URBAN PRITCHARD, was accorded to the hon. medical officers, and to the Lady Superintendent and her nursing staff.

After a few words of thanks by Miss Marian Pritchard to Mr. Warrington Haward for so kindly taking the chair, and his acknowledgment thereof, the proceedings terminated.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF NON-SUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.—Mr. Alfred F. G. Fletcher, who desires to enter the ministry in this province, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness. (Signed) W. Blake Odgers, Chairman; James Harwood, Secretary. Note.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation. London, May 25, 1905.

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL.—The first meeting of the Old Girls' Association will be held at the school on Wednesday, June 14, at 3 p.m. Tea at 4. All old girls and former teachers are cordially invited to attend, whether they have received formal notice of the meeting or not. All who would like to become members of the Association, but who cannot attend the first meeting, should send names and addresses to Miss Talbot.

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.—V.

BROOM: "BE HUMBLE!"

JUST as a wood has flowers that grow best within its shade, and a meadow, and a cornfield each have their own special blossoms, so there are some plants which like open spaces, such as heaths and commons. One of these is the golden broom, "the bonnie broom," as Scotch people call it, which often makes a blaze of yellow on a wide open piece of land where no other flowers grow well. The blossoms of broom seem to invite the butterflies and insects to linger near them. If you are near a bush of broom on a sunny day, you will be surprised to see what a number of bees and butterflies are always humming, and buzzing and fluttering around it. It is evidently dearly loved by the insect world, but it is also a useful plant to people as well.

It has curiously strong roots, and is often planted on the sides of banks where its roots will hold the crumbling earth together. Have you not seen it sometimes planted on the banks of the railway as you look out of the train window? Then the thin fine stems are made into brooms, and the young green buds are carefully gathered in some parts of the country and made into pickles! So you see it is useful, as well as being pretty to look upon. It has been, for a long time, considered as the emblem of humility, probably because of the very humble uses to which it is put, yet it has been chosen by Princes for their badge, and though not holding as important a place in history as the rose or the thistle, still it bears a name which is very well known indeed.

In 1234 Louis IX. of France, surnamed Saint Louis, founded an order of knights called the Order of the Broom, and they took for their motto the words: "God exalteth the humble." By leading simple lives, and especially doing all they could in nursing and kindness to help the poor, these knights made a brave effort to live up to the motto they had chosen, and made the flower broom widely respected and loved over France as their emblem.

But it was long before this that broom had been taken as the special badge of a princely house, and so when the Dukes of Anjou became united with the sovereigns of England, broom won its place as one of our royal flowers. There are several legends about the choosing of broom by the Dukes of Anjou, but the following is the one most popularly known There was once, as I daresay you know, a certain Count Geoffrey of Anjou. He was later the husband of Princess Maud of England, daughter of Henry I., and grand-daughter of William the Conqueror. One day, as he was leading his troops to battle, he passed through a rocky gorge, and noticed the golden bushes of broom on either side, just then in their fullest beauty. He noticed, too, how the firm roots clinging to the rocks of the gorge upheld the soil of the banks.

"This plant," he cried, "shall be my badge. I will wear it in my helmet on the battlefield, at tournaments, and when I am ruling my country!"

Then, taking off his helmet, he gathered a fine sprig of broom, and put it in the front, and rode on to the battle. The fighting soon began, and wherever the golden flower was seen, flashing back and forth in the fiercest part of the fray, there brave Geoffrey's men followed it. "Planta Genista!" cried the count, shouting the name of his new badge. "Planta Genista!" echoed his men, and fiercely drove back their foes.

Geoffrey not only took the plant as his badge, but adopted also the name of Plantagenet (Planta Genista), and through his son, Henry II. of England, this became the name of the reigning princes of our country.

Though many Plantagenet kings had something to do with Westminster Abbey, there is only one who had the broom shown upon his tomb. This is Richard the Second, whose effigy is on his tomb lying beside that of his Queen, in the Chapel of Edward the Confessor. The effigies are of metal, gilded all over. The King is dressed in coronation robes, and the cape of his mantle is bordered with a curious flower, which puzzled people for some time, but at last was found to be the blossoms of the broom plant arranged in order. It is strange that he only, of the eight Plantagenet kings, should have had their badge put somewhere on his tomb, for he was the last of the house, and with his successor, Henry IV., the day of the golden broom in history was over, and the white rose sprang into fame.

It is sad that in some countries broom is said to stand as the emblem of a traitor. In Sicily it is often plucked and thrown at anyone who is suspected of having betrayed a friend. There is a curious, very old legend, which may have started the idea of its being a traitor.

Once, when Jesus was a little child, his mother Mary was crossing a pathway in a wood, with him in her arms, when she heard some soldiers coming. Fearful lest they should belong to Herod, she looked for shelter among some bushes of broom close by. But these set up such a crackling of their branches as she tried to enter amongst them that the soldiers must have heard it, and, looking for the cause, must have seen her. Fortunately, there was an ash tree close to the crackling broom, and the legend says that it not only gladly sheltered Mary and her child, but drooped its branches to the ground with sorrow at the behaviour of the broom, and has been known ever since as the weeping ash.

But quaint as this old legend is, it is pleasanter to think of broom as the emblem of humility, and as a peculiarly bright and sweet flower.

The poet Wordsworth wrote these lines in praise of the way the leaves and twigs remain green and glossy even when the flowers fade and die:—

Am I not
In truth a favoured plant?
On me such bounty summer showers,
That I am covered o'er with flowers,
And when the frost is in the sky
My branches are so fresh and gay
That you might look on me and say—
"This plant can never die!"

ABSOLUTE SONSHIP.

THE question, "What is Christianity?" is again asked in this month's Contemporary Review as "the question of the hour" by Professor SAMUEL MCCOMB, of the Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, and the answer, though we do not find it in any one explicit sentence, appears to be that, if by Christianity is meant a religious faith, it is faith in CHRIST'S Divine Sonship, not as man's sonship is, "imperfect, inadequate, dependent," but an absolute sonship, "perfect, ideal, archetypal." According to Professor MCCOMB, the greatest teachers throughout the Christian centuries have held that there is "but one source of truth, the supreme manifestation of GOD in the Son of His love"; and that clearly is his own opinion. "The Incarnation," he says, "the advent of GOD in the mind of CHRIST, the presence of the Absolute so far as the Absolute can enter into finite conditions, is the article with which Christianity stands or falls."

Professor MCCOMB, who illustrates the complexity of the problem as to the Christianity which we know to-day by a long quotation from Mr. CARPENTER'S "Christianity and the Religions of the World," is not satisfied with the neo-Hegelian interpretations of the Master of Balliol and Professor PFLEIDERER, nor yet with the teaching of those distinguished representatives of the school of RITSCHL, Professor HARNACK and the late AUGUSTE SABATIER. He quotes HARNACK'S well-known saying: "The whole of JESUS' message may be reduced to these two heads—GOD as the Father, and the human soul so ennobled that it can and does unite with Him"; and from SABATIER'S "Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit," these sentences: "The GOD who is in Heaven revealed Himself in the heart of JESUS as His Father; JESUS felt Himself to be living in GOD as His Son. And we find in almost every word He uttered the proof that He proposed to create the same filial relations between His disciples and GOD, that this should be the distinctive mark and essential content of that piety with which He bent every effort to inspire them." But this, which he calls the RITSCHLIAN answer to his question, viz., that the two thoughts of the Fatherhood of GOD and the Sonship of man "exhaust the vital significance of the Christian religion," does not satisfy Professor MCCOMB. He wants something more than that "message" of JESUS to give the assurance that Christianity brings us into touch with "the Infinite Reality," the reality of the Divine Fatherhood, and he finds it, as above stated, in the unique, archetypal, absolute Sonship of CHRIST. "Only as CHRIST'S Sonship is conceived as absolute and final can any adequate ground be discovered for such a splendid faith—the root of all our optimisms—as the universal Sonship of humanity."

But do those large words, "unique," "archetypal," "absolute," we must ask, actually bring us any nearer to the Infinite Reality of the true life with GOD?

CHRIST, we are told, transformed man's faith in the Divine Fatherhood into "an immutable certainty and made it man's inalienable possession"; in him we are aware of a new spiritual quality, a unique self-consciousness; and since he came, "GOD has been interpreted in terms of CHRIST." It is from "the mystery of CHRIST'S filial consciousness" that we gain our real assurance of the Divine Fatherhood. But this "mystery of CHRIST'S filial consciousness," the consciousness of "a peculiar and unique Person," we are apparently to take on trust, not because we can enter into its meaning, but because it is dogmatically asserted. Has that really been the spring of Christian inspiration, and is that the way by which alone assurance can be gained of the reality of the Divine Fatherhood? CHRIST, according to Professor MCCOMB, has not only been the Creator of His Gospel, He is still its Providence.

"Just as our world, divorced for a "moment from the all-embracing energies "of the immanent GOD, would fall into "chaos and oblivion, so, we may well "believe, would Christianity, apart from "JESUS CHRIST, as the source of holy "inspiration, perish from the hearts and "consciences of men. This is a matter on "which history gives no uncertain sound. "Whenever men have entertained mean "and contracted views of His Person, "the pulse of spiritual life has beat but "feebly, 'the enthusiasm of humanity' "has lost its fine glow, and the spirit "of self-sacrifice which in other and "fresher times could throw contempt on "death has shrunk in cowardice before "its spiritual task, through very lack of "its Divine and invisible nutriment."

We do not stay to examine the truth of this appeal to history, or to ask what is here meant by "mean and contracted views" of CHRIST'S person; what we are concerned to point out is the ambiguity of the reference to JESUS as "the source of holy inspiration," and what we suppose we must call the confusion of the Persons in this view of the matter. To reduce CHRIST "to the level of the first among equals in whom GOD has revealed Himself with varying degrees of fulness," is, we are told, to break with the historic records, and "to miss the vital secret of the Christian religion." Yet did not PAUL himself tell us of the first born of many brethren, and of the heirs of GOD, joint-heirs with CHRIST? "First among equals" may be a clumsy expression, but the whole meaning of the Gospel of JESUS, as we understand it, is that he is not "a peculiar and unique Person," separate from our humanity, but that in literal truth he shows us what our life with GOD may be. We are brought to our conviction of the Infinite Reality, when we begin to live a truly human life, in CHRIST'S spirit, doing the will of our Father in heaven. Not by any speculation as to an archetypal or absolute Sonship do we come to know with calm and sure conviction the love of GOD, our Father, but by doing as the Master bids us, becoming as a little child, in trust and obedience. The Infinite Reality is always close at hand. It opens to us and gives us vision of the perfect life, as we cannot too often insist, in the common experiences of daily duty and affection. There it is that GOD is nearest to us; and because He is there, the enlightening and quickening Spirit, we are able to understand all the meaning of the life of JESUS, and his great words appeal to us as the very truth of the Eternal. Not the theory of sonship either in PAUL or the Fourth Gospel, still less in the later theologies, has been the abiding inspiration of the Christian Church, but just the spirit of unselfish love and helpfulness which we may share with JESUS, resting in the strength of the Eternal Righteousness. Such, at least, is our conviction. So amid all diversities of speculation, we see the hope of the future, and the hidden promise of the abiding fellowship of the children God.

OF "man-worship" I am not afraid, where the very ground of the veneration for him is his own absolute self-surrender to the Father of spirits, and his invitation to us to be fellows with him in this Sonship. It is precisely this distinctively human attitude of uplooking trust which consecrates for us the personality of Jesus; and this necessarily holds him to the human level. Not till this is left, and more or less exchanged for superhuman attributes and functions, does saint-worship, with its ecclesiastical mischiefs, arise. All moral reverence towards higher character is, no doubt, homogeneous with the religious feeling. But where pure Theism is already enthroned, there is no danger of the dependent ranks of the hierarchy encroaching on the province of the supreme.—James Martineau to F. W. Newman, Nov. 13, 1892.

BY THE REV. JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

MEN engage in many forms of business, but there is a higher business which transcends all special forms: this is the shaping of a character, in Browning's phrase, "the development of a soul." This is the chief end of man. The Westminster Catechism puts it differently where it says, "The chief end of man is to glorify God and enjoy Him forever." For to glorify God and enjoy Him for a longer or a shorter time, character is the sine qua non—that without which no good effect is possible. We cannot improve on the proverbial wisdom of the Old Testament, where it is written, "Wisdom is the principal thing." What was meant by wisdom was no intellectual acquirement. Had the writer been using our modern terminology, he would have said "goodness," or, feeling for a better word, more expressive of the idea of moral reason, rational morality, he would have said "character." "Character is the principal thing." "Character," said Matthew Arnold, "is three-fourths of human life." And, when Sir Walter Scott was dying on a sweet September day, and those who stood about him could hear the pleasant ripple of the Tweed over its stony bed, he said to Lockhart, his son-in-law: "Be a good man. Nothing else will help you when you are a dying man as I am now." There had been times when Sir Walter was in far more serious straits than that of his death-bed, and the same rule had served him excellently well.

Character is the chief end of man, and to get character is something more than to be a good man in the narrower acceptation of the term. There are good men, as Thoreau said, who are good for nothing. Character means being good for something, good for much. Character is an educated, a completely fashioned will—a will that is intellegent to discern the better things and strong to realise them. Character is realised goodness. To say, "Video meliora, proboque, deteriora sequor"—"I see the good, and approve it, I pursue the evil"—is a confession of moral indigence, a confession of the lack of character. Such a confession you have somewhere in Stevenson. I will be obliged to anyone who can tell me where, so that I may look it up and see to what extent Stevenson is sympathetic with the invertebrate creature who makes this pitiful confession. "You would," the speaker says, "propose to judge me by my acts! Think of it—my acts! I was born, and I have lived in a land of giants. Giants have dragged me by the wrists since I was born out of my mother—the giants of circumstance—and you would judge me by my acts! But can you not look within? Can you not understand that evil is hateful to me? Can you not see within me the clear writing of conscience, never blurred by any wilful sophistry, although too often disregarded? Can you not read me for a thing that surely must be common as humanity—the unwilling sinner?"

Those who plead after this fashion in extenuation of their faults are a drug in the market. Yes, just exactly that, in a different sense from the ordinary, but quite as apposite. They are narcotics. They benumb the moral sense of the community as they do their own. They mistake their promises to pay for the discharge of their moral obligations. We have had far too much insistence on the desires of the heart, as if these had in them the making of a man. The good outward act is something less than the complete desideratum, if it be not accompanied by an inward passion for goodness. But the inward passion for goodness, still less mere velleity of a good intention, falls even farther short of the exigency of character wherever it fails of actual embodiment in the concrete of life. The proverb, "Hell is paved with good intentions," is a more universal truth than your proverb usually is. Good intenions do not deprive a man's evil actions of their contagious character, do not make those with whom a man associates immune to the diseases of his moral will. George Eliot was nowhere sounder than in her stout insistence that a man's stock of good intentions or the feebleness of his will takes little or nothing from the damning character of his evil deeds. These go upon their desolating way quite as effectively where a man is an "unwilling sinner" as where he rejoices in iniquity. The life that he has maimed and marred is not made whole again by his comforting assurance that he saw and approved the better way, although he took the worse.

Character is an integrating force. It does that for men which Jesus is reputed to have done for them in the New Testament narrations. It makes them whole. Hence we should naturally expect that the sources of character, agreeable to its end, would be as various as human nature in its several parts. It is not bred in moral isolation. Morality may be three-fourths of human life, and still it is not all. Besides there are the morals of health, the morals of intellect, the morals of the affections, and of the spiritual sphere. Time was when the effect of bodily conditions upon character was not denied, but it was held to be entirely harmful and depressing. "Who shall deliver me from this body of death?" cried the Apostle, meaning the encumbrance of his physical nature. "For I have," he said, "a law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law that is in my members." But we have come to see that bodily conditions have a double working; that it is only those that are morbid that make for moral disorder; that those that are sound and healthy make for the more just deliverances of conscience and for the triumphs of the moral will.

> "To man propose this test:
> Thy body at its best,
> How far can that project
> Thy soul on its lone way?"

The ascetic doctrine was that something of this kind might be done if the body was sufficiently kept under and brought into subjection, if it was emaciated with fasting and lacerated with the scourge. This doctrine has not been approved of late so much as formerly. Frederick Robertson said, "It is a mean and cowardly thing to attempt to govern the spirit by the flesh." But I am not entirely sure that he was right. If a man had reasonable confidence that he could starve his sin into obedience, I think he would be foolish not to make the trial. If there are devils that go not out but by prayer and fasting, by all means let us pray and fast. But, somehow, the doctrine didn't work. The ejected devils came back bringing others of a worse description. The most characteristic note of monasticism was the lascivious mind: Renan conceived that the monk's brooding pruriency was further removed from a good life than the frank illicit "pleasures" of the worldly sort, and I incline to think him right. The proper regimen is one that strengthens the body to meet the assaults of temptation, and not one that weakens it. And resistance to temptation is not the whole of character. Character has a positive side. A man's work, a woman's work, requires a good physical basis. As an army cannot fight without sustenance, so cannot the individual. The higher moral choices are determined, the modern pyschologists assure us, by the definiteness and persistency of the attention which we give to the motives which we are persuaded should prevail. Now fixed attention requires a background of physical energy. The tired man cannot be trusted to do anything well. The tired blacksmith will scamp his work; the tired shoemaker will lengthen his stitch; the tired writer or artist will say, "This will have to do." A student of English politics finds that the bias of weariness and hunger upon parliamentary legislation has been immense. Let men be very tired and hungry, and they will vote for anything to get away. I have seen men so hungry that, had it been necessary, in order to bring on the dinner, for them to vote down the republic and establish an absolute monarchy, they would not have hesitated long. There are hundreds of moral exigencies in which a man needs all the possible energy of his body to re-enforce his will. What a difference it makes to a man's capacity for the higher choosing to put a solid bar of sleep between his evening and his morning hours! The base concession that was so threatening has become impossible, the duty that seemed impossible has become almost as easy as to turn one's hand.

Another source of character, another means which those engaged in the construction of this noble edifice will find extremely serviceable, is a wise choice of those associations which, individually and in their aggregation, will make it easier and more natural for us to choose the better way. We pray continually, "Lead us not into temptation"; but our praying will not help us much if we take no pains to avoid temptation, if we walk straight into it, if we go about, as some do, seeking for it as for hid treasure. There are books, there are people, there are various associations, which we know are favourable to the better inclinations of our minds, and there are others which we know are not so, which to our baser inclinations are like wind and tide to a storm-driven vessel driving on an inhospitable coast. Now, whether it is or not a posssible thing for us to make the direct choice between motives opposingly soliciting our wills to some special action, it is certainly possible for us to choose those things, those associations, which we know will be favourable to our better wills. It seems true that what we cannot do for ourselves in the way of direct effort we can do with a certain noble indirection. The moral enemy that is too strong for a direct attack may be circumvented, taken in flank, and so routed utterly. It is the moral atmosphere we breathe that is determinative of our moral action. There are intellectual and personal associations that as surely tend to evil as the stifling air of noisome tenements tends to disease. There are houses in New York where consumption is inevitable. The new tenant may be robust, but shortly he succumbs. There are other houses in New York as fine and sumptuous as these East Side tenements are cramped and noisome, but they are more dangerous. They have infections of their own. To breathe their atmosphere is to invite moral death. There are men and women, too, exceedingly well mannered and well dressed who conceal deadlier weapons than those of the assassins who are carrying up our homicidal figures by such leaps and bounds. But these metaphors are too striking for the common run of our experience. Indeed the moral problem would not press so hard if the solicitations to the lower planes were so conspicuous as those for which these metaphorical figure stands. Professor Maudsley assures us that the line between sanity and insanity cannot be drawn. None of us, he says, is absolutely sane, none of us altogether insane. And between the most sane and the least there are innumerable gradations. It is so with moral differences. Men are not good or bad, but good and bad, mingling the worse and better elements in innumerable degrees of variation. Because these things are so, it is the more difficult to discriminate between environments and choose the better associations and avoid the worse. But the necessity for doing the best we can in this regard is not lessened by the difficulty of the matter. We do know something of ourselves, something of our better tendencies and worse, and we can do something to surround ourselves with personal and other influences that will make for righteousness.

Another means at our command in this work of spiritual construction is the economising of our better impulses whenever and however these declare themselves. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and men cannot tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth. So also is the spirit." What we know is that there are these impulses to goodness, to evil, also. There is what is called "the impulsiveness of consciousness." A homelier expression of the fact is the saying that man's moral nature has a hair-trigger constitution. This, I believe, is one of Professor James's happy sayings, or one of his excellent quotations. He is full of both. George Eliot has this fact in mind when she says that "there are moments when our passions seem to speak for us, and we only have to stand by and wonder." To the same tune we have Browning singing—

> Oh, we're sunk enough here, God knows!
> But not quite so sunk that moments,
> Sure, tho' seldom, are denied us,
> When the spirit's true endowments
> Stand out plainly from its false ones,
> And apprise it if pursuing
> Or the right way or the wrong way
> To its triumph or undoing.

As the painter economises the good light on his subject, or the sailing-master the puff of favourable wind upon his bellying sails, or the poet his unwonted inspiration, so in our character-making should we economise those impulses of consciousness that tend to the creation of character, to the evolution of a righteous will.

"Be not overcome of evil," reads the New Testament Epistle, "but overcome evil with good." Doing good for evil may be intended here, but the injunction is equally applicable to a man's dealing with the evil of his own disposition. There is much room here for what has been happily called "the expulsive power of a new affection." If you find yourself drawn to courses which you know tend to no happy end, and find the frontal attack on them discouraging, do not imagine that your experience is at all singular. It is not so. It is that of most people making the fight for a good character it is that of all. That is to say, we make little progress so long as we are simply trying not to take a particular line of conduct which we know to be injurious. Try the expulsive power of a new affection. Set your attention on the attractions of some better way. "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things." We conceive that we are getting on famously, and we are, in some respects; but we have made no advance on the excellence of this prescription. It is one that cannot be attended to too closely wherever the character-making business is in hand. These considerations, if I am not mistaken, impinge on certain of our literary tendencies at the present time with striking force. A great deal of our current fiction justifies, or seeks to justify, itself by the plea that its daring exhibition of life's seamy side, its laying bare of things disgraceful and unsweet, does not condone the things displayed, but rather excites our horror and disgust, and, so doing, fortifies our righteous will. It is as if, remembering the first part of a familiar quotation,—

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien
> As, to be hated, needs but to be seen —

we forgot the second part,—

> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Turning to Bartlett's Dictionary for the exact form of this, I was glad to find that, in that wonderful treasury, "virtue" was a much more common word than "vice." Our current literature tends to reverse that proportion. And it is not well that it should do so. There are images which cannot be dwelt upon without moral injury. They soil the attentive mind. The baser sort are quite as apt to find their condonation as their rebuke in raking over the unwholesome field of contemporary vice and crime so assiduously cultivated by our modern art. It is better far for those who have debased themselves to see > How awful goodness is, and . . .

> Virtue in her shape how lovely, see and pine
> Their loss,

better, too, for those who have not lost the freshness of their early inspirations. I have more faith in the attraction of things fair and sweet than I have in the repulsion of things base and mean and low. "Whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely and of good report, think on these things." Think on them until their beauty and nobility passes into your soul, and is incarnate in your flesh.

> We needs must love the highest when we see it,
> Not Lancelot, nor another.

Character-making is in good measure a matter of good habits. Good habits and an educated will are different aspects of one and the same spiritual reality. Reading of late two books by men of very different temper and method, both dealing with the factors of the moral life, I said, I wonder if they will get through without appealing to Professor James's chapter on Habit in his "Principles of Psychology." And, sure enough, they both came round to it before they reached the end of their discourse. I have come to expect that gravitation to Professor James's exposition in every new book or writing that deals with the subject of character-making in any serious fashion. Certain passages of Wordsworth and Tennyson are not more inevitable in those connections to which they are pertinent. I have myself recurred to Professor James's exposition of habit so often that there is little need that I should do more than remind you of it now. (And, by the way, the exposition is not really so much Professor James's as it is Professor Bain's, James taking it from the older teacher's generous hand and passing it along "like bread at sacrament.") Here and now I will barely remind you of the more significant of the rules to which these distinguished teachers invite obedience. First, launch yourself with as strong and decided an initiative as possible; that is, do all you can to re-enforce your right motives, put yourself in conditions that make their ascendency as complete as possible. That was a good anchor to windward which the drinking man threw out when he offered fifty gold pieces to anyone who should find him in a certain wine-shop where he had too often gone. The second rule is, Never suffer an exception to occur till the new habit is securely rooted in your life. It was at this point, you may remember, that we had that happy illustration of the ball of string. Don't let it drop. A single fall will undo more than many turns have wound. Next, seize the first possible opportunity to act on every good resolve you make. It is with fine sentiments as it is with good resolutions. A good tree bringeth forth good fruit. In the natural order a tree may live a long time in a state of miserable fruitlessness. In the moral order it is different. There the tree, the moral sentiment, that does not bear good fruit dies so inevitably that a prophet's curse would scarcely hasten its decay. "Go put your creed into your deed." The unexpressed tends as inevitably as earth's gravitation to its centre to mere nothingness. There are men who revel in a Barmecide feast of empty moral dishes. These are those sentimental exaltations for which a man takes great credit to himself, as if they were counted to him for righteousness, when in fact he is rather worse for them than better. Only in proportion to the realisation of such exaltations in the concrete of action is there any real moral gain. Beware of that preaching or reading which makes you "feel good," as the saying is, gives you a pleasant sentimental titillation, and does not send you back to your home to be a better husband and father, to your politics to be a better citizen, to your business for a completer honesty, there is all the difference between the one kind and the other that there was between Demosthenes and another Athenian orator. Hearing this one, the people said, "What a fine oration!" hearing Demosthenes, "Let us go and fight Philip!" Sentimental exaltation that does not have this practical effect is facilis descensus Averni—the slippery down-grade to hell.

Much humour has been expended on the naming of the creatures in Eden by Adam and Eve. Adam is supposed to have said, What shall we call this? and Eve to have replied: It looks like a toad and it hops like a toad. Why not call it a toad? But the calling of things by their right names is an important matter. A rose by any other name would hardly smell as sweet. There was truth as well as nonsense in my friend's opinion that "only a man named Shakspere could have written Shakspere's plays." Upon the moral plane to call a thing, a tendency, a vice, by its right name is half the battle. It is just here that Professor James's innominative drunkard staggers upon the scene. So long as he can find some other name than "being a drunkard" for his miserable condition, he will go from bad to worse. And, as it is with drunkenness, it is with other faults. Fine names for them are foul excuses for continuance in sin that grace of comfortable self-satisfaction may abound. The finding of sweet-smelling names for foul political proceedings and commercial immoralities is one of the most dangerous devices of the spirit of evil in our time. It is a great deal easier to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan," when you have definitely and finally resolved to give him his right name.

Finally, there is no more instructive parable in this matter of character-building than that of the divided house—"A house divided against itself cannot stand." We use the word "integrity" as a synonym for honesty, but it deserves a fuller denotation. It ought to signify the completeness and consent of a man's whole nature, each part working in harmonious consent with every other to a sufficient end. "It is a rule of life," says Theodore Williams, in a very beautiful sermon on this subject, "that our characters must move altogether if they move at all. Character is a unity. We want not virtues, but virtue." Yes, this is what we want, and we must not be satified with less. Nevertheless, we may be glad for less if more cannot be had: "Half a loaf is better than no bread." There is no aspect of life that is more comforting to me than that afforded by the better strands appearing in life's web of mingled yarn, good and ill together. The "faithful failures," God bless them every one!—the men whose virtues jostle their faults in strange, incongruous ways. I shall not unsay what I said only last Sunday, that there are faulty men the sum total of whose ethical effectiveness is more than that of many who are void of blame, but so negatively virtuous that arrowroot is more nourishing to the body's strength than they are to the body politic. Nevertheless, we cannot easily exaggerate the danger that pertains to a divided house. Integrity, wholeness of moral tissue, is the eternally exigent ideal. Character tends to one level. We may not with any degree of safety "compound for sins we are inclined to by damning those we have no mind to." Especially does any tolerated fault tend to drag down the whole character to its own level. Even where there is no toleration, where a good fight is made, but made in vain, the base infection spreads.

> It is the little rift within the lute
> That by and by will make the music mute;
> Or little pitted speck in garnered fruit
> That, rotting inward, slowly moulders all.

Let us be glad and grateful for every manifestation of the better self of men whose dominant strain is evil, glad and grateful for the realised good, whatever its proportionate part; but let us not accept anything short of a complete integrity as the mark of our high calling. Choosing that mark and straining towards it with indomitable will, we shall come far enough short of the glory of God to prevent our being exalted above measure. But we shall do better than if we were more easily content. And there will be something left for other lives in other worlds, God willing! Browning is right—

> If a man's reach do not exceed his grasp,
> What's heaven for?

ANERLEY CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

SIR,—My attention has been called to a correspondence in your columns with reference to Dr. Warschauer's acceptance of the assistant pastorate of my former church at Anerley. It does not seem to be clearly understood by some of your correspondents that during the last fifteen years of my ministry there I had, as I had claimed, an absolutely free pulpit, a pulpit as free as any Unitarian pulpit in the land. Dr. Warschauer will enjoy the same freedom, neither more nor less. It was long ago determined by my people that they would be guided in spiritual things by the living voice and not by the "dead hand," and I was allowed fullest liberty to re-state the doctrines set forth in the trust deeds in terms of modern thought. Upon that heritage Mr. Wallace and Dr. Warschauer will enter, and be as free as they have ever been to speak the truth that is in them.

ITALIANA.

II.

SIENA.

THE Sienese have a pretty way of counting four. They say that Siena "tiene il primo posto in Italia, dopo Roma, Firenze e Venezia," she holds the first place in Italy after Rome, Florence and Venice. Although we have met those who say that she holds the first place before Rome, Florence and Venice, her own judgment is perhaps the soundest, saying proudly, as well she may, "Towering Siena enthroned upon her hill is one of the fairest of the cities of Italy." One of the first things that strikes and startles an utter stranger to Siena, is to see, from the Via Cavour, in the Piazza Tolomei, at the top of a high column, "Rome's Wolf with demi-gods at suck." We soon discover that Siena claims descent from one of those demi-gods, and we are pleased to amend a little our defective genealogy, and learn that Sena was the son of Remus, and the nephew of Romulus. Siena has many claims to our attention and admiration. It can boast of having an incomparable cathedral, unique, indeed, at least in one respect, and that is in the magnificent construction of its pavement. It can boast of an incomparable saint, the "candido giglio," the white lily, St. Catherine of Siena, in her day, the living symbol "of peace and Italianity," "di pace e di Italianità," as another Catherine expresses it, and "who," in the charming words of Carducci, "arose and passed like a smile, and every step, and every act and deed of hers was a manifestation of Divinity," incessu patuit Dea! And Siena can boast of an incomparable freethinker, in whom some of us have a kind of genealogical religious interest, the apostle of religious toleration, whose only dogma was virtue—the virtue that is practised, and not merely preached, to wit, Faustus Socinus, of the illustrious family of the Sozzini. Elizabeth Barrett Browning's allusions to Siena carry us back for a moment to Florence and to the famous Casa Guidi Windows, which we saw between the Via Maggio and the Piazza S. Felice. There on the wall we saw engraved in marble the inscription which "grateful Florence" had placed to her memory in 1861. We believe the three greatest names of ideal women in Italy are Matilda, Beatrice, and Catherine; hardly less great now, one feels, is the name of this Elisabetta, whose poetry formed "a golden link" between Italy and England. Mrs. Browning alludes in one place to the prominent part played by Siena towards the Union of Italy, and how she saw from her Casa Guidi Windows—

> Siena's she-wolf, bristling on the fold
> Of the first flag.
> in the famous procession that met
> On the stone
> Called Dante's—a plain flat stone scarce discerned
> From others in the pavement—whereupon
> He used to bring his quiet chair out, turned > To Brunelleschi's church, and pour alone
> The lava of his spirit when it burned.

Then in the second part of her Casa Guidi Windows, Mrs. Browning, in another mood, refers to those rows of heads of the popes in Siena Cathedral, that astonish one looking up to the roof.

Those whom she-wolves suckle
Will bite as wolves do in the grapple-closing
Of adverse interests. This at last is known
(Thank Pius for the lesson) that albeit
Among the popedom's hundred heads of stone
Which blink down on you from the roof's retreat
In Siena's tiger-striped cathedral, Joan
And Borgia 'mid their fellows you may greet,
A harlot and a devil,—you will see
Not a man, still less angel, grandly set
With open soul to render man more free."

When we first saw the Cathedral and the Campanile, in which the black and white stripes of marble seem more accentuated, a "voice" amongst us uttered the word "zebra." And there was an obvious resemblance in the stripes; and Mrs. Browning had gone as far as speaking of it as "a tiger-striped cathedral." The cause of this black and white marble striping may be explained by reference to still another animal. Black and white are the colours of the Dominicans, i.e., of the "Domini Canes," as the Order did not disdain to consider themselves. And besides, before Dominic was born, his mother dreamt about a strange black and white dog, with a torch in its mouth. And so from small causes flow great effects. And we see from Siena Cathedral, the kind of stuff into which dreams may be transformed. The interior is even more effective than the exterior. It may be a groundless fancy but we cannot help fancying that the very nature of the architecture, and of the coloured marbles, the black and white preponderating, led to the inspiration and invention of the marvellous figured pavement in Siena Cathedral, which is its unique feature. As has been well said, "it would be hard to imagine another species of floor that would have so satisfactorily completed the many coloured interior harmonies of this wonderful cathedral." But that being so, one cannot but wonder at the circumstance that except for a few weeks after the middle of August, the entire centre portion from the west door to the High Altar itself, is carefully protected by boarding. However, sufficient is left uncovered to give one an idea of the unique effect of this stroke of genius of the original designers—a work extending over five centuries of Sienese art workers, and employing in one shape and another over fifty contributary artists. "The execution varies. The oldest scenes are simple outlines engraved on the white marble, and filled with black stucco. Shading was then introduced by the use of grey, and also of coloured marble, so that the graffito gradually developed into an elaborate mosaic." The first thing that meets the eye is an inscription: "Castissimum virginis templum caste memento ingredi." Be mindful to enter chastely the chaste temple of the Virgin: And when we remember that the Cathedral is said to stand on the site of a Temple of Minerva, and was succeeded by a church of Santa Maria Assunta, we can perceive why Hermes Trismegistus, Contemporaneus Moysi, meets us at the threshold, with a quotation from his "Poemander" (the Shepherd of Men), flanked on each side by glorious figures of the ten Sibyls, each with her appropriate quotation, all leading up, in prophecy, to the ascended Mary, and to the Wisdom incarnate through Purity. The next representation is of the Emblems, or Badges of Siena, surrounded by those of her allies. In the middle is the Wolf of Siena suckling the Twins; then all around, Florence (a lion), Lucca (a lynx), Pisa (a hare), Viterbo (an unicorn), Perugia (a stork), Rome (an elephant bearing a tower), Orvieto (a goose), Arezzo (a horse). Then in the four corners and smaller, Massa (a smaller lion), Grosseta (a goat), Volterra (a vulture), Pistoia (a dragon). The next representation is Pinturicchio's Allegory of Fortune; and here we stop at the very threshold, as it were, of this elaborate glorification of Paganism, Italianity, and Christianity. How exquisite it is in general effect may partly be conceived from the reduced copy of the entire Cathedral Pavement to be seen in the building called the Opera del Duomo, and how exquisite it is in details can only be known by careful inspection on the spot. Photography, so omnipotent everywhere else, seems baffled by this art. We could stand gazing down into this heaven at our feet from morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve, a summer's day, and yet find it quite inadequate to convey all its glory or its story. And meantime there is the famous library of the Cathedral to see, with Pinturicchio's Scenes from the life of Piccolomini (Pius II.), with portraits of this artist and of Raffael, who seems to have helped the older painter here; and still more urgent is it to see the Opera del Duomo, where are the original fragments and original designs of the Cathedral Pavement; for nearly the whole floor as it now is seen (or not seen) is the work of modern artists under the direction of Prof. Alessandro Franchi, the present head of the academy in Siena; and here too, is to be seen Duccio's "Majestas," the Triumphant Madonna, Duccio, greater than Cimabue, and whose picture was borne in triumphal procession, like that master's, and placed over the high altar in 1310, with the inscription: "Mater Sancta Dei, sis caussa Senis requiei, sis Ducio vita, te quia pinxit ita"; and then there is the Palazzo Pubblico, of the slender tower del Mangia, with its famous rooms, to be seen. But we can only take a hasty glance through the Sala della Pace, and look upon the figures of Peace, Justice and Concord, especially Peace, reclining so gracefully on her couch, with an olive branch in her left hand, and her head with a wreath of olive, resting on her right hand—one of the figures that haunts us. Then there are some most important churches to be seen; but chiefly we must look in at San Domenico, for here is the chapel of St. Catherine, in which the head of the Saint is preserved in a silver reliquary, enclosed in a shrine dating from 1466; and here are the Frescoes of Sodoma, and, most striking of all, the Ecstasy, or swoon of St. Catherine. This fresco of Sodoma's, and the "Scourging of Christ," in the Academy, leave indelible impressions on the mind. And there are palaces and vistas of beautiful streets to be noticed at least. What a perfect picture is presented by the Arco di San Giuseppe, with a distant glimpse of the top of the bewitching tower. How lovely are all the windows and doorways of all these palaces we hastily pass, for we cannot stop to look at palaces when there is so much of interest indoors elsewhere. And at any cost we must pay a visit to the Casa di Santa Caterina, with its pretty Loggia over the front door, and its long inscription about a visit of King Humbert and Queen Margherita here—the modern inscriptions are all too long—and the short inscription in Latin, which is eloquent, however strange: "Sponsae Christi Katerinae domus." A saintly woman, a woman St. Francis, dying before she was thirty-three, through over work, on behalf of peace and unity, and who could sway Popes and Kings as well as everybody else, apparently rendering superfluous the woman suffrage question. Such a person's life merits our admiration and our study. She personified, says an enthusiastic admirer, the whole human ideal of faith, womanhood, and civic gentleness. Legends have a spiritual reality in them when the people of whom they tell are spiritual realities, and no doubt this truth inspired Professor Alessandro Franchi to adorn these old walls with the old golden legends in a new setting. He seems to us at least like an old master returned, to light up our dingy prosy surroundings, and so to lighten our darkness, and to lead our feet into the paths of golden legends and peace. Be that as it may, his work is generally exquisite, and it is perhaps a matter for regret that he is a modern. But as some of us hold no briefs for the infallibilities of certain centuries, or of certain men, we stand and gaze with delight on this golden legend of St. Catherine in Siena, by Franchi, as we did on that of St. Ursula, by Carpaccio, in Venice. We were shown into the little room where St. Catherine lived and slept. We saw some hard stones or bricks in a dark corner, protected with iron bars, and we asked the custodian, an old woman (Monna Lappa perhaps), what it was, and as she said something we did not catch, and as she perceived it, she put her hands together under her face, as if resting her head upon them, and said "Il guanciale, il guanciale," the pillow, the pillow. And so that was Catherine Benincasa's pillow. Another pillar of stone found soft as a pillow for a weary head, and another discovery of the Gate of Heaven, and of the House of God. Filia Sancta Dei, sis caussa Senis requiei, sis tibi vita, tu quia vixisti ita!

E. L. H. THOMAS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The final services in the old church were conducted on Sunday, May 28, forenoon and evening, by the Rev. Alexander Webster. At the first service the Sunday-school children met with the adults. The church was decorated with flowers. Appropriate hymns were sung, and special sermons were preached. The large congregations testified to the pathetic interest taken in the farewell gathering. But the parting from the place of worship occupied for sixty-five years, though touched with sadness, was cheered by the hope of entrance in the course of a year into a building more worthy of the Unitarian cause. Till the new church is ready, the congregation will meet in the Union Hall.

Chester.—The Revs. Alex. Gordon and C. Peach addressed a meeting of the congregation in Matthew Henry's Chapel, on the 29th ult., on behalf of the Jubilee Memorial Fund of the Home Missionary College. Mr. W. Orret moved and Mr. E. Powell seconded a resolution of thanks pledging the meeting to further the cause to the best of its ability. Messrs. W. W. Tasker, D. E. Oliver, and the Rev. J. K. Montgomery spoke in support of the resolution, which was carried with acclamation. The Rev. H. E. Haycock, who presided, announced that the sum subscribed at the close of the meeting amounted to £13. This is in addition to £6 11s. already forwarded to the fund by a few members of the congregation. During the forthcoming winter the Menander Club hope to arrange a dramatic and musical entertainment to further supplement the congregation's contribution.

Clifton (Presentation).—The Rev. Dr. Warschauer preached farewell sermons at Oakfield-road on Sunday, and after evening service a meeting was held, over which Mr. W. Hall, treasurer of the church, presided, when a presentation was made to Dr. Warschauer of a cheque from the congregation, and thirteen volumes of the "Century Bible Series" from the Men's Open Meeting, which he established three years ago, and which had been a great success. The chairman and Mr. P. J. Worsley spoke warmly of the value of Dr. Warschauer's services, the independent lines of his work, its signal success, and the influence he had gained in wider circles. Mr. T. L. Davies and Dr. Cole spoke on behalf of the Men's Club, and Mr. E. G. Edwards on behalf of the Men's Open Meeting. Much regret was expressed that Dr. Warschauer was severing his connection with Oakfield-road, and, in acknowledging the gifts, he spoke of that, his first settlement, as having been most happy in every respect.

Dukinfield (Resignation). — The Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, M.A., has resigned the pastorate of the Old Chapel, after a ministry of twenty years. At a large meeting of the congregation he was unanimously requested to reconsider his decision, but at another meeting of the congregation, held on Sunday evening last, it was announced that Mr. Tayler's decision was final, and the congregation then regretfully accepted his resignation.

London: Kentish Town (Jubilee Bazaar).—To commemorate the Jubilee of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, a bazaar was held in the school-room on Wednesday and Thursday, and was opened on the first day by Mrs. Wallace Bruce. In addition to the stalls in the school-room, there was a most interesting exhibition of sketches of Old St. Pancras, autograph letters of Dickens, Carlyle, and others, old books and other curiosities, arranged in the aisle of the church, while among other items on the programme were organ recitals by Mr. John Harrison and Mr. Sydney Baynes; tableaux, arranged by Mr. W. Savage Cooper, and various competitions. At the opening, on Wednesday afternoon, the Rev. George Critchley presided, and Mr. Arthur Cooper, the hon. secretary, read an interesting historical statement concerning the Church. He told of its establishment fifty years ago, by the Rev. W. Forster, who had been previously minister of a Congregational church, and of the opening of the church on July 5, 1855. It was, he thought, the first of their churches to be called a Free Christian Church, and its unsectarian spirit was expressed in the inscription, "Diversity of opinion no bar to Christion communion." The church supplied a deep need in that neighbourhood, and large congregations assembled in those early years. Macready contributed to the building fund, and Thackeray was an occasional attendant. After Mr. Forster, who died in 1871, the ministers had been the Revs. P. W. Clayden, J. P. Ham, C. E. Pike, J. C. Odgers, L. de B. Klein, A. Farquharson, and G. Critchley, the present minister. Mr. Cooper concluded with the expression of his conviction that the church still had a great future before it. The Rev. C. E. Pike proposed, and Mr. A. E. Lacy seconded, a vote of thanks prospectively to Mrs. Wallace Bruce for opening the bazaar, and she then gave her opening address. It had been a great pleasure to her, she said, and to her husband, as President of the Provincial Assembly, to go to the churches in various parts of London, to make new friends and see the work that was going on, and she hoped that their present celebration would not only bring them the money they needed, but would mark a real step of progress. Their first minister had come from orthodoxy, and had founded that Free Church. It was a precious inheritance, and the obligation was laid on them to maintain the same true spirit. Their open doors, she felt, ought to be opened wider than ever in the present time, and their hearts ought to be opened wider to maintain that spirit of freedom which had always been cherished there. Mr. Pike had referred to the inspiration in her husband's name in the history of Scotland. She liked to think that his ancestors had been among the Covenanters who had fought and suffered for religious freedom, and when they were driven out of their own country to the North of Ireand, the Bruces still upheld the same causel there. During the past fifty years immense strides had been made towards freedom in religion, and they should go forward fearlessly. She had pleasure in declaring that bazaar open, and she wished them every success. The sale then proceeded, and we hope next week to have news of the result. More than £50 had been received in donations beforehand. The Revs. F. K. Freeston, F. Allen, and T. E. M. Edwards were among those present. Mrs. Bayle Bernard, who had been from the first a loyal and generous supporter of the church, was unfortunately prevented by ill-health from being present.

London: Stratford.—In connection with the recent Unitarian services for the people held at the Stratford Town Hall, a social evening was given at the above chapel on Thursday, May 25, under the auspices of the joint committee which had arranged the services. There were about a hundred present, including friends from Mansford-street, Stepney, Limehouse, Walthamstow, Forest Gate, and Stratford. Among those who spoke were the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, W. N. Rose, J. Toye, and F. Allen, and Mr. Hahnemann Epps. The report given of the services was very satisfactory, and it was mentioned that the churches concerned had felt the benefit by increased numbers at their services. It is hoped that the services will be repeated another year. A good musical programme was provided by members of the various churches, The secretary of the West Ham-lane Sunday-school (Mr. George Shute, 53A, Romford-road, Stratford) will be glad to receive contributions towards the annual summer treat to be held on Saturday, July 8.

Mottram.—The Sunday-school anniversary services on May 14, were most gratifying. The preacher, the Rev. Charles Roper, delivered two able and practical sermons to large congregations, the chapel being full in the afternoon, and at evening service packed with nearly 500 people. Fine weather enabled many visitors and friends from neighbouring townships to be present, including about 40 from Dukinfield, and several from Glossop. Collections and donations came to about £23. Special music was rendered by the choir under the direction of Mr. J. W. Wild. The second annual sale of work, advertised as "May Fair" on this occasion, took place on Saturday, May 27, and was opened by Mrs. Hugon S. Tayler, of Dukinfield, with Mrs. R. Moss, of Charlesworth (Congregationalist), presiding. The Revs. H. S. Tayler, A. Cunliffe Fox, W. G. Price, and J. Williams (Congregationalist), of Brookfield, Dinting, attended, in addition to the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, resident minister. In the evening there were two children's entertainments, and two dramatic performances. The proceeds amounted to about £46, which was considered very satisfactory.

Swansea.—The Rev. W. Tudor Jones during the present University term is studying at Jena, and the anniversary sermons were last Sunday preached by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. In his morning sermon Mr. Gordon took the opportunity of referring to the Jubilee scheme and the new college buildings.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Stopford A. Brooke is to preach at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, on the two next Sunday evenings, June 11 and 18. The evening service at Rosslyn Hall begins now at half past six.

THERE is every prospect of large and interesting anniversary meetings in London next week; 122 ministers have already intimated their intention of being present. Delegates of 110 congregations outside the metropolitan area have accepted the invitation of the Laymen's Club to luncheon on June 15. Four hundred tickets for the Essex Hall Lecture by Professor Henry Jones have been issued in response to applications received up to June 6. The President's luncheon will be attended by representatives from America, Belgium, Iceland, India, Norway, Tasmania, and other countries. The attendance at the conversazione is sure to be large; a new feature this year will be the singing of a few glees by the London Choral Society. Our readers should also bear in mind the meetings of the Sunday School Association on Tuesday, and the religious service at Little Portland-street Chapel on Wednesday morning, when the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, of Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, will be the preacher. At the public meeting at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, an attractive list of topics and speakers is provided. Essex Hall has been redecorated for the meetings; and visitors will be interested in seeing Mr. Emslie's portrait of Dr. Martineau occupying the central po ition on the walls.

WE have quoted at the conclusion of our leading article this week the closing passages of the Annual Address of the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., as President of the American Unitarian Association, given in Boston on Tuesday evening, May 23. Here is another passage from that address: — "Co-operation with larger "Christian fellowships permits us to rise "occasionally out of the comparative "isolation of a small pioneer body, and "to realise that the men who are standing for the larger ideals and the newer "methods in the great Protestant communions are fighting there the same "battles for freedom and reason and "toleration in religion that our fathers "had to fight. It is true that the great "Protestant denominations have sometimes treated Unitarians as heretics, "unworthy of the Christian name; but "more and more we find our natural "allies. With growing frequency we see "the white flags of truce and amity floating over the old citadels of orthodoxy. "We are enabled to discover the vitality "of the liberal forces in the great Protestant bodies, and gratefully to recognise the good which results from the "religious teachings of men with whose "theological opinions we are not always "able to agree. It is surely one of the "principles of our own faith to acknowledge and respect all manifestations of "the religious life wherever it is found.

"May we not cherish the reasonable "hope that, with little or no diminution "in the number of sects, we may come "into an ever-larger sympathy, each "cultivating his own garden with assiduous care, but each rejoicing in the "other flowers and fruit, not always "harping on the weeds, taking down all "the fences, but allowing the ancient "landmarks to remain, loyal to our own "traditions, reverent of the traditions and "usages that others cherish with glowing "heart?"

A CONFERENCE under the auspices of the Christian Social Service Union, and presided over by the Lord Mayor, was held at the Mansion House on Monday afternoon to consider the problem of the unemployed, with special reference to the labour and training colonies at Lingfield and Starnthwaite. Statements were presented by the Rev. J. L. Brookes in respect of these colonies, and by Colonel Lamb as to the work of the Salvation Army at Hadleigh. The Bishop of Ripon described the terms of the resolution he was called on to move as deliciously vague. The phrase is not without application to the meeting as a whole. Indeed, what was regarded as the timidity of the platform aroused some impatience in a section of the audience. And at the close of the official programme a member of the Social Democratic Federation moved an amendment declaring the labour colony scheme to be a preliminary step to the national organisation of industry. But this was not accepted by the chairman, and was not put to the meeting.

IT is possible that the absence of Mr. Walter Long, who was to have spoken, gave some impression of flatness to what should have proved an important occasion. At any rate, most of the speakers pointedly avoided discussing the causes of unemployment. But at the same time there was a general acceptance of the propositions laid down by more than one speaker—the right of every man to claim work, and the responsibility of the community for providing it. The unanimous endorsement of these principles by a City gathering is evidence of an advance upon the opinion of even a couple of years ago. The Rev. Peter Thompson went further, and was supported by his hearers, when he pointed out the inadequacy of philanthropic measures. He declared the response of the public with a mere £50,000 for the Central London Committee on the unemployed to be quite too small for the needs of the case. This is obvious. We are faced with a national problem which can only be dealt with on national lines.

INTERESTING particulars of the work of the Christian Social Service Union were given by the Earl of Meath, the president of the Union. The Lingfield Colony is firstly for the unemployed, of whom there are about fifty in residence. Many of the men are too broken down in character for much permanent result to be obtained; but more than one in three of them are really set on their feet. That is to say, even among the outcasts, a third are not degenerate. The colony also exists for the training of workers—"House Fathers," as they call them in Germany. And lastly there are the homes for epileptic children, with about 100 inmates. The Starnthwaite home is entirely for this class of children.

THE work done by these epileptic homes is excellent. Under healthy conditions a large proportion of the children lead healthy and happy lives as children, and are prepared for a manhood which, though incomplete, might also be healthy and useful. The provision, however, is lamentably small in comparison with the child epileptics of the country. Something is hoped for in the way of more complete provision, now that the whole system of elementary education is being co-ordinated under public authority. But if the children are provided for, what of the men and women? Their need is so far recognised that a small villa has been taken for some of the elder boys. And it is well that the Christian Social Service Union should so point the way; but quite obviously, if anything effective is to be done to meet the need of the whole country, the nation must do it, for its own sake no less than for these its suffering members. To a very large extent the epileptic population serves to recruit the ranks of the unemployable, and any attempt to make provision for the unemployed must recognise this.

THERE is something not a little pathetic in Dr. A. Beet's last address to his students. He is leaving them in order to speak out again a message within him that presses for utterance, in order to be able to state certain conclusions which his reason persists in drawing. He had promised the Conference not to teach his doctrine of Last Things to the students of Richmond College, and not to republish his book without the consent of the Conference. He evidently feels that it was a hard promise to exact from him, and that very hardly he has been held to it. "If men had said in Conference what they said outside, probably my appeal would not have been denied." Yet as one reads Dr. Beet's account, one feels that what has taken place is only what is inevitable where there is a great and strongly organised church, which is bound to be always thinking of and working for its own collective success. A man pleads, "But I have something to say, that presses for utterance, that ought to have been uttered before, that for the sake of truth and to relieve the minds of the perplexed must be said now." And the answer is: "Do not say it. Do not say it now. We must not have people's minds divided, or even distracted. The Century Fund has been started. It must be a great success. Your doctrines and interpretations must wait."

IT is matter of satisfaction every way that Dr. Beet has at length broken through his restrictions, and will give to the world his latest thoughts. There may be no very great originality in his interpretation of the New Testament, but there will be great earnestness of conviction; and his Wesleyan readers will be bound to reflect that the writer of the book on "Last Things" believes his own doctrine surely enough to be able to suffer more than a little for its sake. The book will therefore be more than a study of eschatology, it will be a study in moral faithfulness.

A FINE collection of the works of the late George Frederick Watts is open to the public in the Manchester City Art Gallery in Mosley-street. Sir Wm. Richmond, at the opening ceremony, spoke of Watts as being of all the men he ever knew, "the kindest, gentlest, most inspiring." He himself once said that his endeavour had been "to impress distinctly the direction of modern thought," and that in his pictures, with few exceptions, "reference to spiritual dogma has been purposely avoided." The pictures speak to many whom undogmatic sermons seldom reach, and ministers in the district might well study these allegories of life, death, love, conscience, heroism, and lead their congregations to visit them and learn their meaning while the opportunity is freely offered.

WATTS, who died last July, left to the Royal Academy of Arts such of his studies from nature as the President might select, and, with some exceptions, the rest of his studies and works to provincial galleries, as his executors might determine. One hundred and nine works are to be placed in the gallery erected by Watts at Limnerslease, which was his country house, at Compton, near Guildford. This gallery is to be freely open to the public at least three days in the week. Sixteen portraits of distinguished contemporaries will be among the pictures there, until the time arrives for them to be added to the National Portrait Gallery. The Manchester Art Gallery will receive three valuable works, and one each will go to the galleries of Edinburgh, Dublin, Nottingham, and Norwich.

THE Manchester City News has collected information respecting the kind of reading done by the borrowers from the free libraries in two artisan districts of Manchester, Openshaw and Harpurhey. It is found that a larger proportion of fiction is read in Manchester than in West Ham, London. In the latter place, according to recent returns, published in London, about fifty per cent. of the books issued were fiction, while in Manchester about eighty per cent. are of this class. This seems an altogether excessive amount of light reading; for though "fiction" includes some excellent and even "deep" books which are in fair demand, the great majority of those borrowed are not of the better class, and it would be unsatisfactory if it were to be concluded that only one fifth of the reading done by the people of England was devoted to the whole range of literature outside this popular classification. It may well be remembered, however that the classics of our great authors are not and cannot be readily assimilated during the week or fortnight during which a library book is borrowed. Those who, for example, read with pleasure the poems of Wordsworth, Shakespeare, Milton, Tennyson or Browning, the writings of Carlyle and Ruskin, Martineau, or Spencer, will, if possible, seek to possess copies of the books they will turn to again and again; and alongside the returns of the public libraries should be recalled the large sales of the excellent cheap editions of the masterpieces of nearly every branch of literature and of books of educational value.

A SUMMER school for the study of social questions is to be held at the Co-operative Holiday Home at Park Hall, Hayfield, Derbyshire, during a week beginning June 19. Those of either sex, and of all shades of opinion, who are interested in the social movements of the day are invited for conference and discussion. The subjects to be considered include the State of our Town Populations, Human Débris, German and English Methods of dealing with Poverty, Labour Colonies, German Cities, Labour Bureaux, the Care of Cripples and Epileptics, "Back to the Land," the Science of Sociology, and the Inner Mission of the Church. Among the leaders of conference will be Mr. T. R. Marr, Mr. Percy Alden, Mr. T. C. Horsfall, Mr. A. Holden Byles, Rev. J. B. Paton, and Mr. J. Lewis Paton. Such interchange of opinion among those who are in earnest in desiring social reform should be valuable, and not the least part of the benefit will be the opportunity of personal conversation and inquiry. If the weather permits, the evening meetings will be held in the open air.

THE Rev. James T. Eells has resigned his charge of the First Church in Boston, in order to succeed the Rev. Theodore C. Williams as headmaster of the Hackley School, at Tarrytown, N.Y. The Christian Register, in making the announcement, says of Mr. Williams, who was the first head of the school, that he "at once set "up high standards of scholarship, refinement, and manly good feeling among "the boys and all concerned in the "management of the school. To a "casual visitor the atmosphere of the "place seemed charged to a remarkable "degree with sentiments which made of "the school something more than an institution of learning. It became a home "of high culture and manly aspiration. "From the beginning until now the schoo "has advanced steadily in prosperity, in "successful training of boys for college, "and in good report among its patrons "and supporters." Of the new headmaster the Register says:—"He will "succeed Mr. Williams, who will set for "him a high standard of attainment; but "among all our ministers we cannot "think of any one who, by intellectual "gifts, personal influence, and academic "training, is so well fitted as Mr. Eells to "take up without pause or shock of "change the high traditions of the school." And of the Hackley school itself it is added:—"This is our first experience in "establishing a school of this kind for "boys under openly avowed Unitarian "influence. The experiment was made "against the current of opinion in the "Unitarian body and in opposition to all "our traditions of academic training. "Thus far it has been demonstrated that "Unitarian control of a preparatory school "is consistent with the unsectarian spirit, "the generous toleration, and the breadth "of scholarship which are the standards "of culture in the democracy of learning."

The World's Work and Play is this month a holiday number. It opens with an illustrated article on the coming "Sherborne Pageant"; there is also an article on new fruits and flowers, with a picture, among others, of a bunch of white blackberries; and a first article on "Life in the Country Cottage," with illustrative drawings by Mr. P. Morley Horder.

THE SOUL OF THE LONDONER.

THE critics are praising a recent volume entitled, "The Soul of London." It is a clever, literary, sketchy survey of the great city, a very readable but superficial trial to get at its personality—to see London at work, London at play, London at leisure, London at rest. But it is steeped in a bitter-sweet melancholy; its first word to the reader is, "By my faith, you have great reason to be sad," and the final inference of it all is that London has no soul. The author does well to apologise for his title. Yet the book does indirectly bear upon a more important matter, and one more profitable to consider, and that is—the Soul of the Londoner. What influences in the life of London go to the marring or the making, to the deadening or the quickening, of the souls of men?

I.

Look, first, at the difficulties, that we may know them as such. And the first surely is this: The vast size of London as a whole dwarfs the individual, lessens his power of influence over others, and so chills his own life. "An awakened sense of observation is in London bewildering and nerve-shattering, because there are so many things to see and because these things flicker by so quickly." And these great crowds, so our author thinks, "chill out of us the spirit of altruism itself, or make of that spirit a curse. Living in a smaller place, we know almost each member of it. We can hope to help, or be interested in, each man and woman that we meet." But in London there is no hope of that. The power of the individual is scattered into none effect. What prophet shall make London listen to him? I have heard a speaker bring a vast audience to their feet with a roar by simply saying, "Men of Manchester." What speaker here would dream of beginning, "Men of London"? Every educator, preacher, reformer speaks and works here, less or more, into the air; his efforts are largely lost in space; there is no spirit of place to give them a local force and definiteness. And the inevitable result is that the contact of soul with soul is far less, and the deep springs of life are unreached. Hence there is more moderate ardour, less power of character, more colourless mediocrity, less distinct and virile individuality.

And, alas! it follows from this—a strange paradox—that there is also less sense of neighbourliness, and, in consequence, less practice of those neighbourly acts which draw out people at their best and often cement their souls into intimate friendships. It would be a calumny to say that in London there is none of this; but from the force of circumstance there is less. We are so thick on the ground, we are in the midst of so much humanity, that, however willing we may be, we simply have not time or energy to know everybody, still less give them our intimacy. And hence we are cut off from that easy friendly intercourse of locality, that daily greeting and inquiry, that helpful interest in our neighbour's story which do so much to keep up the sympathetic spirit of life. There is less outflow of soul from one to another: our neighbour is simply the person next door; we have more acquaintances but fewer friends, and are always being thrown back on ourselves, instead of drawn out in response to others. The fellowship of kindred souls has to depend upon letters and visits rather than on the nearer, readier range of our place of residence. And if anywhere there be utter loneliness, nowhere, surely, can it be more utter than in London. "Water, water everywhere, but not a drop to drink," was the cry of the ancient mariner athirst on the vast, salt sea. "Men and women everywhere, but not one who cares for me"—how frequently, how terribly, is that the cry rising out of this vast sea of humanity. Alone in the midst of five millions: that is the sting of neighbourless loneliness, and it exists in London, and it deadens the soul to both God and man.

There is a yet further deadening influence which results from London's size, and that is the violence of its social contrasts. "So down Piccadilly to Hyde "Park Corner on a pleasant summer day. "On the right you have all those clubs "with all those lounging and luxuriating "men. On the left there is a stretch of "green hidden and rendered hideous by "many a recumbent form. They lie "like corpses, a great multitude of "broken men and women, : : : motionless, dun coloured, pitiful and horrible. "There, indeed, are the two ends of the "scale, confronting and ignoring the one "the other. For the men in the windows "never look down; the men in the park "never look up." What is the effect of this picture on the soul of the onlooker? Seen for the first time it stirs hot indignation, and the demand that something must instantly be done; seen for the second, it raises a sickening bitterness that our social chaos permits no such quick redemption; seen again and again, and in other places, it tends to make the soul callous as the only way of enduring the social extremes of London.

Callous—yes, or else rebellious, for is not that the mood of the men on the ground. They may be to blame for their position: they may be unreasoning in their condemnation: they might soon sink down again to their present condition if given the means of earning an industrious living. But all the same, their opinion of wealth without labour will be angry, rebellious, and bitter. And whether their temper be right or unfair, London, alas! gives us many a picture of the man who layeth up earthly treasure, and is not rich toward God.

There is another influence in London which is adverse to the soul's well being. It is the merest commonplace to remark that the tension of London life is great, that it takes more out of us, exhausts our energies, and inflicts more strain on the nerves. But it does more than this. it exacts a greater strain yet on the spirit, and it leads to the tired heart. For all who feel and think this is an almost inevitable result. The issues are so deep, the problems so urgent, the appeals and counter appeals to our sympathies are so constant and so insistent: it is harder to be quite true and straight, and to keep one's trust both in friend and opponent; it is easier to meet with defeat or disappointment. We recall the last entry in Amiel's Journal—"Que vivre est difficile, O mon cœur fatigué!" Amiel lived at Geneva in retirement; had he lived in London what would he then have felt? It is not a sentimental, but a real peril—this spiritual fatigue of soul. It rises from a too strained activity; it results in a restless inability to either take things more calmly or deal with them through a deeper philosophy.

And yet where is there more necessity to go forth quietly and assuredly than in this tumultuous city, to keep that tumult out of the heart, to lay our striving human wills in the lap of the divine purpose, to observingly distil the soul of goodness out of things evil, to lose all self, but not self-control, in the holy ambition to make one's whole life a blessing. London can not only hinder, but help to this end.

II.

Look now at the brighter side. And first, London's size is not all disadvantage. It widens our range; it forbids small views; it fills the little with the large; it lifts the personal into the general, and prevents us from magnifying mere detail. Knowledge, experience, and the conduct of affairs are on a greater scale, the mind must be more alert, the spirit wider awake to respond to it all. London presents a vast aggregate of interests, a great crowd of circumstances, a great world of persons, changing like a kaleidoscope with every turn of event, yet consisting of the same component parts; and this mighty mass and crowd of things is always pouring forth its influences upon us, its comedies and its tragedies, its light and darkness, its achievements and its problems, ennobling, baffling, but all endlessly, interesting, engrossing, arresting, nay ceaselessly calling "give me sympathy, help me, rejoice with me, weep with me: live for me as you live in me, identify yourself with my surging life." And in proportion as we hear and obey that call, we go forth to life and we save our own soul.

The plea that London dwarfs individuality may be redeemed and turned the other way. There is a famous epigram by Bushnell that "the soul of all improvement is the improvement of the soul," and that is too true to brook denial. But the true improvement of the soul does not come through the isolated self-culture of the individual but through identification with the whole. It was a greater than Bushnell who said, "He who would save his soul must lose it"—lose it, that is to say, in the larger life of humanity. Is there any place where that more needs doing, or can more fully be done, than in the absorbing, abounding life of London? Said the late Bishop Westcott on one occasion, "We are suffering on all sides from a tyrannical individualism." But why and when is individualism wrong? It is right as an end, but often wrong in its method. Christ showed the true end, but also the true method. Personal Christianity is the true individuality. Live your life selfishly, without sympathy, without sense of responsibility, without oneness with the community, and you cultivate a false and empty individuality. You lose your life in the attempt to save it. Be willing to live for other men—with them, and through them, to bear a common burden, to share a common feeling, to spend and be spent, to save and be saved, to lose and be found, in the spirit of Him who so loved the world, yet loved it not, and you will feel that enthusiasm of humanity, that solidarity of society which produce the true individuality and were the glad discovery of Christianity.

And this is the right way, surely, of meeting another difficulty. Although the sense and service of immediate neighbourliness may, nay, must be, less, the quick contact of life, the real touch of human nature may be here not less, but greater. We think of London too much as a morass of social problems, needing fresh economic solutions, and requiring new machinery for their purpose. Our first concern is not with machinery, but humanity; not with problems, but with people; not with their surroundings, but with themselves. Economists, reformers, legislators, officials are indeed required to improve the outward social machinery in a special expert way; but meanwhile we have all of us to use daily, hourly, the machinery already in use, and to make it convey our own personality in whatever station we may be. The power of the Spirit, if within oneself, can over-ride and transcend all schemes or defects. On the other hand it may redeem by its wisdom and sympathy any schemes that may be from mechanical impersonality. It has been well said that "there is no quality in modern life more beautiful, or in fact more heroic, than the capacity to handle social machinery without loss of moral vitality. To be from day to day an official and still to be merciful . . . and hopeful; to be a reformer without loss of broad sympathy or of hospitality, to be an employer and find within the field of industry room for humanity; . . . to believe in a cause, but to believe still more in the courage, strength and peace to which the cause opens the doors—these are the qualities which redeem social service from its discouragements, its small conceits and its automatism, and make it virile, healthy, happy, and sane." Those are the words of Professor Peabody, of Harvard University; they certainly apply to the London of to-day.

And, therefore, it will appear more and more that the making and keeping of the soul's vitality is almost solely a question of personality. You cannot save souls in bundles; you cannot yourself be one of a batch. You may organise charity by a committee, but it can only act through personal sympathy. You may amend life's environment by some outward improvement but you cannot thus improve its heart. It needs a soul to save a soul. It is only the touch of life than can ennoble life. Legislation and administration are necessary, but it is the necessity of clearing away difficulty, of creating opportunity for the free interplay of personality. When the member of Parliament and the county councillor, and the borough surveyor have done all that belongs to their sphere, they have but prepared the way for something greater that is to come after, and they have not done our work by proxy, but made it more easy. That is to say, they have made it possible for life, for humanity to move more freely, more nobly: the movement, the life, the fuller personality are still expected from everybody. We shall continue to talk inevitably of the great social reforms which are necessary, but the one social reform which yet more urgently must be is the individual duty of getting into closer contact with life personally, giving ourselves more freely, thoughtfully, sympathetically, whatever and wherever we may be, receiving back continually the response of many hearts. Even one such contact with life at its centre, will reveal the meaning of London to both giver and receiver.

Is not this, therefore, the conclusion of the whole matter. Live at the centre. Honour your own higher nature; honour that of another. Enter the service of those who love for the sake of those who suffer. Accommodate your private life to that of the body corporate. Be not so fastidiously held down by convention and social expectation. Let there be more open living communication between all classes of men, more spontaneous outpouring of spiritual conviction, more real and vital religion. For when the great questions swarm thickly upon us, and the awful wonder and the mystery of life deepens, and the very eternities and infinities seem entangled and involved in the maze of daily doings, we shall often pause and ask ourselves what it all means. It means God within the confusion; it means the divine emerging through the human; it means the solemn co-working with Him in that love which makes all things work together for good. It means that we are all under God's orders, all receiving divine commands, all comrades in arms. It means that our strength lies in His, that our faith must trust His slow purposes, that our souls must rest in His peace. FRANK K. FREESTON.

LET the children of labour remember that they are of the class which he of Nazareth dignified; that, peradventure in his youthful days of mechanic toil, he too was looked on by the coarse eye of sheer power; and yet, nurtured amid indignities and neglect, the spirit that made him divinely wise.—Martineau.

WHEN all our old faith has broken up like a ship-wrecked bark beneath our feet, and we are left alone in a wild waste of waters—then, to hold fast to moral right, not to let the soul despair, to look into the dark years before us and still to hope to win light—that is, to be faithful to God in the face of death.—Stopford A. Brooke.

THE Father is All in all—with Him alone we have to do. If we look with unspeakable reverence into the face of Christ, it is only that we may see how God is mirrored in the harmonies of a derived spirit that has become a perfect reflector through obedience; it is only that we may be carried upwards and left alone with the Father.—John Hamilton Thom.

LITERATURE.

A SCOTTISH TRACT FOR THE TIMES.*

THIS is a remarkable book, powerfully clearly, and concisely written by a well-known religious reformer, whose identity is but thinly disguised. It will doubtless form part of the permanent literature arising out of the bitter warfare between the two sections of the former Free Church, and will form a striking landmark between the old dispensation and the new. It is a tale of the Robert Elsmere class, but very different from that hesitating and long-drawn account of a modern pilgrim's gropings in quest of a fresh form of faith. Here the story hastens to its crisis with almost reckless speed, and at each stage there are sudden onsets against the old creeds and traditionalism. United Frees and "Wee Frees" are alike assailed; at times with fierce frontal attacks, or with sweeping showers of argumentative shrapnel, suggestive of the irresistible operations of a Togo or Oyama. The author has performed a service to these militant churches which cannot be too highly appreciated, but apparently they will close their ears to his message. He tells them plainly to cease their wranglings, to enlarge their horizon, and to let the recent conflict subserve the cause of light and liberty. Especially he shows the great dispossessed body a more excellent way of recuperating and rejuvenating itself than it has yet dared to adopt. He depicts in concrete form how the late seeming catastrophe may be turned into a golden opportunity of expanding a sectarian and dogmatic organisation into a true progressive church, in which enlightenment, truth, and charity may reign.

From his thirty years' activity in the midst of Scottish religious movements, "Mark Meldrum" has no difficulty in accurately measuring the men and circumstances around. He weighs the Church of the Disruption in the balance, and finds it deplorably wanting. He selects his hero from the ranks of its ministry, but baptizes him so as to indicate the struggling of two souls in one breast. Knox Rannoch is endowed with the reforming instinct, but his Celtic surname is suggestive of loyalty and steadfastness to the leaders and ideas of the past. Thus the story opens with a secret conflict between the pressure of reason and the power of religious sentiment. The first chapter of the book leaves us in no suspense as to what family of fiction this gifted young preacher and all his kith and kin belong. His own kirk is down on the estuary of the Clyde, his father is a leading light among the numerous Highland settlers in Glasgow, and his father-in-law is also a powerful preacher of contracted Calvinistic sympathies, in the Isle of Skye. Knox Rannoch's wife, a calm, strong, reticent woman, scarcely seems a fitting product of that romantic island. In spite of all the moving aspects and influences of sea and shore, she has remained land-locked and irresponsive, and her husband's unrest and idealism are a mystery she cannot fathom. Hence when the crushing adverse verdict of the Law Lords comes, and the great United Free Church is cast into chaos, she speedily finds her husband hotly pursuing a course that to her is utterly inexplicabe. Preaching in his father's kirk on the following Sunday, Knox Rannoch tells his bewildered hearers what treasures may be drawn from the depth of affliction. The blessing of freedom would atone for the loss of outward possessions, and new lands of thought would lie open to all who cared to migrate over the dogmatic border. Denunciations and recriminations must cease, and songs of emancipation must hail the deliverance of their Church from darkness and error.

Knox Rannoch was no loiterer in the ways of reform, and events moved swiftly, as the steamers that skimmed past the manse which he had soon to abandon. Along the indented shores of the Firth of Clyde there was no sympathy for a soul drifting out towards the open sea of truth. He had dared to set up a judgment seat, and to arraign the stricken Church before it, and he had proclaimed its shortcomings to the world. Little wonder that the hearts of the Presbytery grew hard as the primæval rocks, that the ban of suspension was pronounced, and the sundering of family ties followed. Having temporarily sent his unsympathetic wife to her father in Skye, Rannoch drowns out the manse fire, locks the door in his own face, and, with his only child, a bright and loving girl entering her teens, he goes to Berlin, and sits at the feet of Harnack and other exponents of the modern spirit.

While the silenced minister is thus removed from the strife of tongues and left to quiet meditation, the author wisely asks his readers to follow Ruth Rannoch to her early home in Skye. Here we are introduced to her younger sister, a joyous, charming child of Nature, whose heart blossoms out into a beautiful love for a refined and broad-minded artist, whom she finally marries Much that takes place here must be passed over; but a typical Celtic sermon on the Burning Bush, preached by the Rev. Roderick McCreedie, must be pronounced a masterpiece. Its keynote is the unpardonable sin of the higher critic, and the wickedness of those who would make heaven too large and hell too small. Scarcely a ray of the millennial dawn has yet fallen on the United Free Kirk of Sn'zort, for customs, ideas, and race peculiarities are all intertwined with the ancient faith. But, before all is over, a breath of the Gulf Stream touches the manse, and the glacier of orthodoxy is sliding down the glen.

Thus far the story keeps along a strictly historical track, and actual events and real men are placed on the stage with an almost startling boldness. Now, towards the end the interest centres in the first General Assembly, at which Knox Rannoch has to appear for trial, and almost certain deposition. That Assembly is, of course, anticipated, for the published book was happily timed to meet the "Fathers and Brothers" face to face as they wended their way disconsolately, on May 24, to deliberate in the former Synod Hall of the U.P. Church. This stands to the west of the Castle Rock above a wood bank suggestive of harps being hung upon the willows. The splendid pile of buildings on the Mound (of which Dr. Chalmers laid the foundation stone nearly sixty years ago) had passed into hostile hands, and it must have been with saddened heart that many patriarchal figures took the unwonted route and participated in the maimed rites. And it need not excite surprise that one venerable minister was stricken down, like Eli of old, and, though cared for with loving solicitude, was dead before the opening ceremonies were ended.

This actual Assembly, which only closed about a week ago, is ably bodied forth in the story, and the author's predictions and imagery are rarely at fault. The familiar figures pass before us in long procession—the resourceful ecclesiastical leader, the peer with the ponderous purse, the honest bigot and the scheming clerical strategist, the temporising professor, and the saponaceous politician—all rearing their word-structures of straw and stubble. Knox Rannoch clings to the horns of the altar of truth, but the Inquisitors pronounce his doom. The dignitaries affix their names to the decree of deposition, but we may safely assume that if Jesus had been there He would have gone with the minority. A touch of classic pathos and dignity is given by the father of the proscribed prophet publicly deploring his former mistaken severity, as he now shakes off the dust of the persecuting church, and goes out with his son. A band of kindred spirits soon gathers round the exiled pair, and a "Fellowship of the Spirit" is constituted, but Scotland, as usual, knew not the time of her visitation. Our hero and prophet, ever true and brave and strong, went far and near announcing that salvation does not lie in believing a voluminous confession, but in keeping close to the simplicity and breadth and moral beauty of the spirit of Christ. Unfortunately, in his wanderings he ventured within the forbidden region where the "Wee Frees" were setting up the system of Calvin instead of the Christian gospel, and was done to death by an iron-hearted mob in the streets of Inverness.

It will be interesting to watch whether the United Free Church will openly or covertly bless or curse this book. It comes before the world with the voice of candour and even authority, and warns her to cease building sand-castles and impede the flow of spiritual progress. Though fourteen hundred congregations are still left to her, she will find that other means besides the passing of an Act of Parliament will be required to heal her broken wing. "Knox Rannoch's Prophecy" presses home some unpleasant questions which her leaders will find it hard to answer. It admits that she has built up a great organisation, but challenges her to show that she has displayed a soul above sect. It charges her, in effect, with failing to lift the Lowlands into purity of life and the Highlands into brotherly kindness and peace. The former Free Church has scattered its mission stations over the earth, and with proud pretensions has claimed to assert and defend the Headship of Christ, but has it encouraged its people to look into the great mirror of nature, and to bow before the one true and infinite God? As yet, "United" though she be, she has got no farther on her journey than an encampment by the waters of Marah, and for the present generation it may be wise to drop her symbol of the burning bush, and to take for her motto, "All your days ye shall dwell in tents."

ANDREW CHALMERS.

IN THE BOOK-ROOM.

VISITORS to the Book-Room at Essex Hall during Whit-week will find a number of new publications which ought by no means to be overlooked.

A book which everyone should buy is the volume of Mr. Armstrong's last course of lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," which is just out; and there is a new edition, enlarged and rewritten, of that useful little book on the fundamentals of religion, "Know Thyself," by the Rev. H. S. Solly. The Rev. Walter Lloyd's "Theist's Apology" should also be noted.

The new series of the sixpenny "People's Edition" of well-known books has already been widely distributed, especially the first two volumes to be issued, Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," and Mr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels," with its valuable new chapter. There is also in this series F. W. Newman's "Soul," with Professor Upton's Introduction, and a volume of seven sermons by Dr. M. J. Savage, selected from his larger book on "The Passing and the Permanent in Religion." Dr. Savage's last book, "Pillars of the Temple," with a preface by Robert Collyer, will also be welcomed by many who value his clear and broad-minded teaching.

Another little book that has come to us from America is "James Martineau and his Greatest Book," by J. T. and E. R. Sunderland, a "Centennial Tribute," to which Mr. Sunderland contributes a brief sketch of Dr. Martineau's life and work, and Mrs. Sunderland, who is Ph.D., an analysis and epitome of the "Study of Religion." Collectors of Martineau books will like to have this also, and we may hope that it will do for American readers what Mr. Armstrong's "Analysis and Appreciation" of the same work, in Clarke's series of "Small Books on Great Subjects" has so admirably done for English readers.

Among Sunday-school books a re-issue in one volume of eighteen of the "Short Sermons to Children," by Three Cousins (Martineau), is sure of a very cordial welcome. We would call attention also to Messrs. Isbister's shilling edition of the English version of Charles Wagner's "Simple Life," and another volume (3s. 6d.), by the same author, "The Better Way."

To the new series of "Sermons by Unitarian Ministers," we have already called attention. Visitors should also secure a copy of the sermon on "The Alchemy of Purpose," by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, preached at the last annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union.

The June number of the Mill Hill Pulpit is on "Our Indian Brethren," a sermon preached by the Rev. C. Hargrove on Empire Day.

There are now a number of Unitarian Tracts in foreign languages to be had, the last to be issued being "Der Unitarianismus in Seiner Tieferen Bedeutung," a rendering of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland's "The Larger Meaning of Unitarianism." Mr. Bowie's "Plea for Unitarian Christianity" has been rendered into both German and French, and in the latter language Dr. Brooke Hereford's "Main Lines of Unitarian Christianity" is also published.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

WE called attention last week to an article in this month's Contemporary by Professor McComb on "What is Christianity?" Dr. Greville Macdonald's article on "Vivisection and Progress" should by no means be overlooked. It is a serious attempt at an impartial statement of the case, giving credit to the strong arguments on both sides in this controversy, pointing out what has actually been achieved by the method of vivisection, and showing the mischief of exaggeration on the part of its opponents, yet very strongly emphasising the moral arguments against the prevalence of such a method, and urging that it should be absolutely forbidden for teaching purposes.

"The hope of the future," Dr. Macdonald writes, "the possibility of progress, "are bound up in the understanding that "increase of wisdom will arise and build "strength upon no other foundation than "our inheritance of humanity: The "cruelties of fashion in feathers and "furs, the barbarities of sport in grouse-"drives and pigeon-shooting, the in-"humanities of trade in slaughter-house "and poultry cramming, cannot be "separated in their influence upon the "race from the barbarities that some-"times, if they do not commonly, "figure in the physiological laboratories. "Excuse is found for all. The need of "warmth and artistic adornment seem to "exonerate the woman of fashion; the need "of food and healthy exercise appear to "justify the healthier male; the hunger "of the multitude may make difficult "mercifulness in slaughtering oxen; and "the needs of science may seem to sup-"port the physiological laboratories. "Yet one and all fall under condemna-"tion of the sane and pitiful, who "believe that the progress of man can "advance only through the strength of "his nobility."

An article that we have found of special interest in the Nineteenth Century and After is that by the Rev. Hubert Handlay on "Anglican Starvation and a Liberal Diet." It is the Broad Churchman, he declares, who must prevail in the twentieth century. The present High Church ascendency has led to a certain effeminacy in the clerical type, which loses hold on the men of this country, and to other faults, which are duly noted; but, if religion is to hold its own, it must be on the Broad Church principle which makes spiritual experience the basis of Christian belief, and demands an open mind, wide sympathies, and a manly religion that shall be thoroughly English. To be a Broad Churchman now, says Mr. Handley, involves the sacrifice of personal advancement, yet "a sacrifice here, or, indeed, in a hundred other ways, will do the liberal clergy no harm. It is the moral pre-requisite of duty and achievement."

The Independent Review is full of interest. Canon Barnett's article on "Public Feeding of Children" utters a word of wise warning against the weakening of home ties and responsibility as essential to a strong nation, and shows how the urgent need of the ill-fed children may be met. We note also the trenchant article on "Catholicism and Morals," by G. G. Coulton, and the articles on "Chinese Labour in the Transvaal," by Doris Birnbaum, and "The Call of the East," by A. M. Latter.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN WARREN.

IT is with much regret that we record the death of Mr. John Warren, of Nottingham, who died on May 29 in his ninety-third year. Mr. Warren was born on December 11, 1812, and was a member of a Lichfield family. Here he was brought up under the shadow of the Cathedral, and amid the literary and musical traditions which were associated with the names of Dr. Johnson, Erasmus Darwin, Miss Seward, and John Savill. This last and Mr. Warren's grandfather, a man of great musical gifts, were two of the leaders of the Handelian movement in England in the eighteenth century All Mr. Warren's relations were Churchmen, but, of independent mind himself, he was led in the direction of liberal thought, and long before he became associated with Unitarians, he had arrived at their theological position, a position he ever afterwards held of mature and strong conviction.

He had many interesting reminiscences of early Lichfield days—of the return of the troops after Waterloo, of the naval and military traditions of the Napoleonic wars, of the French prisoners who were quartered at Lichfield, of bull-baiting in the Market place there, of Hugo Meynell, of Dr. Johnson's friend (the Rev. Henry White, who figures in Boswell's "Life," and whom he knew intimately), of Darwin's "Botanic Garden," still partly remaining in his day, of the celebrations of the early coronations of the last century, and the reception in Lichfield of the "Bill of Pains and Penalties."

In 1837 Mr. Warren received an appointment in the London Post Office, through Lord Lichfield, the then Postmaster-General, and in the same year became clerk to the surveyor of the Midland district. Through this appointment he became connected with Nottingham, and there met his future wife, who was the daughter of Mr. John Crosby, postmaster of Nottingham, a staunch member of the High Pavement Chapel. In this way Mr. Warren became more closely connected with the Unitarianism which he had already been led to accept by independent thought. In 1843 he was appointed surveyor of the Post Office for the North of Scotland, where his district extended from the Forth to the Shetland Isles; and in July of that year he married and entered upon his official duties. This was the year of the Disruption, and he used to tell of the admiration with which he and his wife witnessed, all over Scotland, the members of the Free Church, who had then just withdrawn from the Establishment, worshipping in the open fields. Mr. and Mrs. Warren first settled in Perth, but there they found no Unitarian chapel. "Thank God," it was said to them, "the last minister" (Thomas Fyshe Palmer, who was transported for his political opinions, and to whose memory is raised the "Martyr's Monument" in the Calton Burying Ground in Edinburgh) "was banished, and there is no congregation here now!" —and during their year's residence no person, notwithstanding Mr. Warren's official position, ventured to make friendly acquaintance with the avowed holders of an unpopular creed. After a brief residence in Dundee, they removed to Aberdeen, chiefly because of the chapel there (the lonely outpost of our cause in the North), which was founded by the Rev. George Harris, in the face of insult and even personal violence a few years before. There, for nearly 20 years, Mr. and Mrs. Warren did their best to support the cause, she playing the harmonium, training the singers and teaching in the school, and he acting for many years as treasurer, and, when there was no minister, keeping the chapel open by his own and other lay help. Their house was always open to the ministers who visited the granite city, and they enjoyed the friendship of not a few of our older preachers, among them the Revs. George Harris and George Armstrong, of Bristol, the father of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. Though there was a change for the better from the times when Mr. Harris was pursued through the streets and pelted with mud and stones, the profession of Unitarianism was not to be lightly made in Aberdeen in those days, and Mr. and Mrs. Warren paid the penalty of no little social ostracism for their fidelity to their convictions. Perhaps it may have been their actual experience of these things that caused them to value their faith so highly, and to deserve the Rev. Robert Spears' description of them as "robust Unitarians." In 1865 they removed to Edinburgh, and under happier auspices gave the like hearty support to the chapel there, till their return to Nottingham in 1880. In 1883 Mrs. Warren died, and two years afterwards Mr. Warren resigned his appointment. Since that time he took no part in public life, but he retained to the last a keen interest in passing events and much intellectual and physical vigour. It is no little proof of the latter that in his ninetieth year he went to London to witness the Coronation in August, 1902, and returned again in October to view the procession through South London. Nor did his affection for the religious cause to which he had devoted so much of his time and energy wane when he was less prepared to take an active part in it. He felt a keen interest in the High Pavement and its institutions, and was a generous supporter of most of the Associations connected with our body. For some thirty years he was a vice-president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Mr. Warren was a man of kindly and genial disposition, and had the grace of that old-world courtesy which we seem to have lost in the modern haste of life. He had many friends, who will greatly mourn him. With the exception of his deafness, Mr. Warren preserved his faculties almost unimpaired to the peaceful close of his days, and retained his happy spirit to the last.

He was buried in the General Cemetery, Nottingham, on June 1, the service being conducted by his old friend, the Rev. James Harwood.

MRS. MALTLY.

MANY of the active workers in our schools and churches in Lancashire and Cheshire, more especially those who have visited the Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, will learn with very great regret of the death of Mrs. Maltly, which occurred on the 31st ult. at her residence, The Old Hall.

Mrs. Maltly had been interested in the Holiday Home movement since its beginning, and she always tried to make the visits to that quiet village among the hills as pleasant as possible. Without looking in at "The Hall for a chat with Mrs. Maltly," a week at "The Home" would have been incomplete. Her genial "Come forward," which greeted the ears of the visitors as they neared her threshold, was always regarded as a hearty and sincere welcome. By her kindness of heart, her quaint Derbyshire speeches, and old-fashioned ways she endeared herself to all with whom she came in contact, and many look back upon their visit to Great Hucklow with increased pleasure for having come to know her there.

The villagers feel that they have lost a kind-hearted and sympathetic neighbour, who was a friend to all. Human life everywhere is the poorer for the loss of such lovable natures as Mrs. Maltly's; but in a small village like Great Hucklow, the loss is almost irreparable. And yet, there is a real joy in the thought, that the long day of hard, strenuous duty in the service of others ended in perfect peace, and that for the tired soul the morning of the eternal day has already dawned.

Her mortal remains were laid to rest on Saturday last, in the churchyard at Eyam. As we turned away from the newly-made grave, tearful eyes were drawn to the wealth of natural beauty by which that place of peaceful rest is surrounded, and the majestic hills, the trees, the flowers, and the song of the birds whispered to our hearts that if the words, "In the midst of life we are in death," to which we had just listened, be true, it is no less true, that in the midst of death we are in life,—Life that is surely making all things new, towards which we are all tending, and into which those for whom we mourn have already entered.

FLOWERS IN HISTORY.

VI.

LILY: "BE PURE AND INNOCENT."

THE old Roman writer, Pliny, ranks the lily next in nobility to the rose, and the two are generally considered as equal queens of beauty and of grace in the land and language of flowers. As if to render homage the leaves of a lily bend back from the stalk, away from the blossom, and help to make one notice the queenliness of this flower. An old English poem describes this.

I love the lily as the first of flowers,
Whose stately stalk so straight up is, and stay;
To whom the leve aye lowly louts and cowers,
As bound so brave a beautie to obey.

There are many kinds of lilies—the cup-shaped water lilies, yellow and white, which float upon streams and ponds; the delicate bells of the woodland lily of the valley; and the one most generally known, the great white garden lily, which stands erect and is the emblem of all that is pure and innocent.

The lily is very closely associated with the Virgin Mary. Very often in old Italian pictures, a vase with a spray of while lilies in it stands somewhere near her. There is one picture, by Rosetti, which you can see for yourselves, if ever you are in the Tate Gallery. It is called "Ecce Ancilla Domini" (Behold the handmaid of the Lord). The Virgin is crouching upon a narrow white bed, just awakened from sleep by the angel Gabriel, who has come to tell her that she will one day be the mother of Jesus. He holds out towards her a most beautiful spray of white lilies, whose shape and delicacy Rosetti has painted most exquisitely, and which is supposed to show the pure sweetness and innocence of the Virgin.

There is a legend about the death of Mary which an Italian painter, Botticelli, put into a celebrated picture, which is now in the National Gallery. The legend tells that after her death, the Virgin rose up into heaven, but one of the Saints refused to believe it, and insisted upon having her tomb opened. When this was done it was found to be filled with nothing but masses of roses and great white lilies. In Italian, the Virgin is called Madonna, and in both France and Italy lilies are spoken of as "Madonna lilies." In the earliest English books upon flowers a lily is called "Our Lady's Lily," and this name has lasted on to the present day, for many country people still speak of "lady lilies," though probably they do not know the origin of the name.

Besides being known as the emblem of the Virgin, the lily has also a widely known place in history as the national flower of France. As long ago as 1048 an order of knighthood was founded, called "The Knights of St. Mary of the Lily," and a good deal later, when this first order was almost forgotten, another King founded the "Order of the Lily" whose knights always wore a collar formed of alternate dragons and lilies. These knights are mentioned several times in French history, but it is generally supposed that Louis VII. of France was the first to choose the lily as his country's national badge.

We can see the lily in Westminster Abbey in company with the rose, daisy and broom, but it is a little difficult to find unless one knows just where to look for it. In the north aisle of the choir, if you look carefully, you will see a number of little old shields, dim and dusty with age, fastened one to each arch in the wall. One belonged to King Louis IX. of France, commonly known as Saint Louis, and was probably put up by our King Edward I., who built that part of the Abbey. This shield is covered all over with tiny lilies, and is the earliest sign we have in the abbey of the lily being the national flower of France. In one more place we can see it, and that is among the many devices on the gates of Henry VII.'s Chapel. Henry was descended from Catherine of France, Queen of Henry V., and wishing to show that he belonged to France as well as to England, he had three lilies put upon his gates.

There is one particular kind of lily, called the "crown imperial," which has, I think, one of the most beautiful of flower legends told about it. This special lily cannot close its petals, as so many flowers do at night, to protect the stamens from the damp and rain. Instead of this the petals hang downwards from the stalk like curious shaped bells, and if you look very carefully at the flower you will find that there is a drop of clear sweet juice hanging at the end of each petal. Sometimes these drops are called tears, and this is the quaint German legend which tells us why the flowers were said to weep.

Among the many blossoms that grew so abundantly in the Garden of Gethsemane, none were so beautiful as this lily. The legend says that at that time the bell-shaped flowers stood upright, on the stems, like so many ivory cups, waiting to receive the refreshing dews of heaven. It was in this garden, among the flowers that he loved so well, that Jesus spent many hours in quiet prayer, and the flowers, as he passed all bent their graceful heads to do him honour. All, except one—and this was the lily. Because she thought herself so much more beautiful than her sister flowers, she would not bow her stately head, but stood erect in the presence of Jesus, before whom all other flowers gladly bowed. Jesus, seeing this, cast on the lily a look of deepest sorrow. Immediately she drooped her head, her petals were stained orange red with blushes, and the little teardrops were formed at the end of each petal. Ever since that day, says the legend, the imperial lily has kept its red colour, drooped its blossoms downwards, and had the teardrops as a sign of repentance.

Above all else when we look on a lily growing in all its beauty in our gardens, we should think of Jesus' words in the Bible: "Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these." Every flower, and particularly these that I have told you about, can teach us something, but there is one thing which we should never forget, whenever we look at a plant or blossom, and that is that it is God who crowns the world for us with so much beauty.

REFERRING to last week's Children's Column, a correspondent points out that Henry IV. was as much a Plantagenet as his cousin, Richard II., whom he succeeded; and that he belonged to the House of Lancaster, which had the red rose and not the white rose of York for its badge, in the Wars of the Roses.

THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH.

ON the eve of Whitsuntide we are led back always to the thought of spiritual enlightment, the supreme gift by which alone religion becomes a veritable possession of our life, and we gain a sure hold upon the TRUTH, which teaches inwardly. Because we, who find ourselves living in this universe of GOD, are something more than the animal nature of which we understand some part of the mystery, and cannot better express it than by saying that we are by nature not merely of the earth, earthy, but of the Spirit, and are essentially living souls, who use the instrument of this mortal body, and can read the glorious language of the Spirit in earth and heaven, therefore it is that only through the spirit can our knowledge grow from more to more, and as further insight and enlightment come to us, we search even the deep things of GOD. So it is given to us to have communion with the Infinite and Eternal, the Father of our spirits, and to know that we have our own place in the Household of GOD. We have communion with the Eternal, and, as we look into the faces of our friends, and know that in them also the same spirit of life is kindled as in ourselves, we enter into that great fellowship of living souls, both the seen and the unseen, on earth and in heaven, and make the great confession of the Church universal, "I believe in the communion of saints." We enter into that fellowship, and, because it is of the spirit, they who are the greater, holier souls become our teachers and the inspirers of our better life. GOD gives them to us as friends and helpers of our true inward life, where the Spirit beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of God. And among them, by the same Spirit, always teaching inwardly, we recognise the "chief of faithful souls"—"seeing it is GOD that said, Light shall shine out of darkness, who shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of GOD in the face of JESUS CHRIST." GOD reveals JESUS to us, and he commands our allegiance; so we are Christians, and know that what we see in him is the true life for us, in the company of the disciples, the true brotherhood of man, as children of our FATHER in heaven.

Last Whitsuntide we had still with us a Teacher whose word was with power. In his own pulpit, in Hope-street Church, Liverpool, he preached on Whitsunday morning a sermon which is now published as the June number of Sermons for the Day.* "The Dispensation of the Spirit" is the title of the sermon, and these are the concluding sentences:—

"When the dispensation of the Spirit is fully come, then men will understand that both their understanding and their conscience are gifts to them direct from GOD, and that there can be no nearer way to learn his truth and his will than by earnestly using these. Any instruction you receive from others, even the most learned and wise, must at the last test be put to the touch of your own reason; it is you, and you alone, that at last must decide what you shall believe.

"And any injunction you receive from others, even the best and holiest, yea, even JESUS, him of the heaven-lit vision, must at the last test be put to the touch of your own conscience; it is you, and you alone, that at last must decide what you ought to do. And that Religion of the Spirit, which is to prevail when the thraldom of the Church and the thraldom of the letter are taken away for ever, will have for its essence that men will believe that GOD speaks to them directly—he, the Living GOD, to them, the listening souls—in their reason and their conscience; and though they may often be in doubt or difficulty, they will never long be of dejected heart, because they will know that the more humbly and sincerely and faithfully they hearken for the living word of GOD, the more surely will they be guided and enlightened by that Holy Spirit, which is the Living GOD diffused through the universe of worlds and souls.

"And so we sing our hymn of this spring-tide festival—

> Mighty Spirit, gracious Guide!
> Let thy light in us abide—
> Chiefest gift at Whitsuntide—
> Holy, heavenly Love, rejoicing in the ever-growing light which that Spirit pours down on the minds of m n, persuaded that all this largening knowledge of our time is only making even more secure the foundations of pure and undefiled religion, and trusting our Father's sure and perfect love for all that is to be."

In these coming days there are to be gatherings of the members of our churches from far and near, to take counsel together concerning a common work and concerning those deep things of the spirit which give to the work its great significance. Such gatherings will be profitable and rich in happiness and mutual encouragement, in so far as we are able to realise together the true foundation of our life and the abiding source of its enlightenment and strength. "The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control." "Let us not be vainglorious, provoking one another, envying one another." And in the same spirit we are bidden to "bear one another's burdens." Those are words good to be remembered both by speakers and hearers, and by all who desire to take part together in the work of our churches.

The anniversary meetings of our brethren in America have already been held in Boston, and the last number of the Christian Register, which we have received, contains the annual address of the President of the American Unitarian Association, delivered on Tuesday evening, May 23, in Tremont Temple. The address gave a general survey of the year's work, and dealt with some practical needs, and concluded with some passages which we will reproduce here. Dr. ELIOT spoke of Unitarians as pioneers of the Christian army, with "pure Christianity" for their watchword. They had sought the place of honourable danger and must not now shrink from the perils and hardships of the service. And he concluded:—

"We must school ourselves to work on without expectation of thanks or recognition, but simply because we must be true to ourselves and to our own ideals of truth and righteousness. The appeal of our endeavour is to the spirit of chivalry, and not to any hope of outward success or popular applause. Our pioneer service offers no place for those who are afraid of the risks or who count the costs or who seek ease and safety and personal rewards. It is for those who love high adventure, who are ready to trust themselves to stand alone in an unroofed universe, who are eager to follow truth wherever it leads. Our warfare is for those who do not dread misrepresentation and unpopularity, but who dread only playing the traitor to their own best dreams and visions.

"Against the sophistries and cant that characterise too much of the religion of our day we must set a sincerity of purpose and speech which never deals in obscurity, which never holds a double meaning, which never shuns the searching light of public scrutiny, but which is always clear and transparent. Such candour does not imply surliness or pugnacity. It is in no sense supercilious: it does not necessarily deal in contradictions. It is perfectly possible to be sincere and at the same time conciliatory. Let us be careful always to speak the truth, but with equal earnestness let us seek to speak it in love.

"We must cultivate the pluck and patience which disregard the abuse of misapprehension, and which cannot be daunted by opposition or chilled by neglect or shaken by ingratitude. A religious pioneer must have that inflexible quality of soul that rises superior to all the fear of failure, to every prophecy of disaster, and every form of obloquy. Yet is this pluck no mere crabbed obstinacy. It is entirely consistent with a disciplined good temper towards opponents. It is the cheerful optimism of men who are mastered and possessed of an idea toward which they must ever strive, who set before themselves a clear, unselfish aim, who represent permanent principles. The moral and spiritual inertia of men makes the task of religious reform the test of heroic tenacity. Ours must be the spirit 'that rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.' Our motto must still be that of the Liberator: 'I am in earnest. I will not equivocate, I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch, and I will be heard.' "

"AS MEN BORN BLIND."

As men born blind must ponder upon light,
Deaf men on sound, though pondering seems vain;
Since only seeing tells the joy of sight;
And hearing only music can explain;
So I, Beloved, must needs my spirit strain—
Long as endures life's dark and silent night—
Some image of a future bliss to gain.

Knowledge will widen—that must mean, for thee,
God clearer seen in all His power has wrought;
And oh! my thinker, still more bold and free
The range and energy of ceaseless thought.
High hopes are these; but yet for one like me,
A simple image, with past rapture fraught,
Seems best to shadow forth what heaven may be.

Our life had days and years most glad and fair,
Yet one joy thrills me still all joys above,
Because it rose on an almost despair—
We two were parted; should we meet? Oh, Love,
I did not dare expect you—you were there!
That says it all; and dying may but prove
A like surprise, and give me strength to bear.

LUCY SMITH.

IN what then consists the opposition between the pursuit of natural and the pursuit of spiritual good?—the desire of physical supplies, and the aspiration after the kingdom of God? It lies in this:—He who seeks after "what he shall eat and what he shall drink" is one whose chief conscious aim is to get such things. He who seeks first "the kingdom of God" is one whose chief conscious aim is not to get them unworthily.—Martineau.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL.

STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL was re-opened after extensive alteration and renovation in the spring of 1898, as the home of the Blackfriars Mission. That mission was the successor of the earlier Carter-lane Mission, which was moved across the river about Christmas, 1879, and became the Blackfriars Mission, in Collingwood-street, Great Charlotte-street and the New Cut successively. The congregation of Stamford-street Chapel has a history going back to the early days of Nonconformity in the seventeenth century, and the present chapel dates from the year 1823. Thus seven years ago, the remaining members of that old congregation with other mission workers took a new departure, and, somewhat after the manner of the Mansford-street Church and Mission in Bethnal Green, determined to devote their chapel and their working resources to mission work among the people of the district.

The seventh annual report of the "Blackfriars Mission and Stamford street Chapel," dealing with the year 1904, shows how the work has prospered, records also the beginning, last July, of the ministry of the Rev. W. L. Tucker. The committee and the workers at the mission have given a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Tucker, and the new minister's first report speaks with a good courage and with much satisfaction of what he has found at Stamford-street, and his first experiences of the work there.

"I expected," he writes, "to find "an 'Institutional Church' dedicated to "the worship of God and the service of "man, and was not disappointed. All "the work carried on here is 'religious' "work in the truest and best sense of the "word. The workers are inspired with "a spirit of practical Christianity. There "is a large number of them, but they "cannot achieve the impossible—more "helpers are needed, and more room. "When the need is realised, and the "importance of the work more fully "understood, both will be forthcoming.

"One thing which continually fills me "with admiration at Stamford-street is "the way in which every available square "inch of space has been utilised, both "overhead and underneath. When "Stamford-street Chapel was built the "'institutional church' was not, I "suppose, thought of. In spite, how-"ever, of this difficulty, the available "buildings have been adapted in a re-"markable way."

At the same time, ardent workers naturally desire larger opportunities, and Mr. Tucker refers to the splendid rooms for clubs and similar institutions at Mansford-street, and to the Mill-street Mission at Liverpool, where he was formerly a worker, as having ideal buildings for such work.

Speaking of the Sunday services, at which the attendance has shown improvement, Mr. Tucker says: "The Church "Parades of the Boys' Own Brigade on "the first Sunday morning of the month "are a good feature. Why cannot we "have a church parade of all the mem-"bers of all our numerous institutions "at least once every Sunday? This "would greatly strengthen the hands of "all our workers."

Lantern services have been found helpful; it is added:—"Some orchestral "music occasionally would, I am sure, be "as much appreciated on Sundays as on "Mondays. The numerical success of our "Sunday meetings depends in a great "degree on the musical arrangements, "and I look forward hopefully to the "future. Our friends at Islington, I am "told, have occasional congregational "'at-homes' after evening service. These "I think, might with advantage be "imitated."

One of the most admirable pieces of work connected with the Blackfriars Mission is that of the Provident Bank. There are now eight districts in the neighbourhood of the Mission, in charge of as many collectors, assisted by a number of occasional visitors; and every Monday the collectors and their helpers go through their several districts to receive the savings of the people. Last year the bank had 1,291 depositors, and the receipts amounted to £849 10s.; these were collected in 21,861 sums, while the withdrawals from the bank amounted to £836 6s. 7d. paid on 1,950 cheques. The number of depositors, Mr. Tucker points out, "has only once been exceeded, "though the amount received is about "£10 less than last year. Considering "the changes in collectors owing to various "causes, the severe depression of trade, "and consequent lack of employment, "the result is extremely satisfactory, and "if the present year keeps up its good "beginning I think 1905 will be one of "the best on record. Since the bank "was started the amount collected has "been over £10,000."

What is of such special value in this work is not simply the lesson in thrift, and the help given to the people by receiving their savings in their own homes, but the friendly relations thus established between the weekly visitors and those to whom they offer this kindly service. Endless opportunities arise for helpful confidences, and for the quiet offices of friendship, for words of counsel and encouragement and sympathy, which may mean immeasurably more in lonely, dreary lives than the visitor may be apt to think; while in cases of real distress the knowledge and the confidence thus gained best prepare the way for the giving of effectual help. And certainly those who engage in such work find that often they receive more than they give in such offices of friendship, through the lessons of patience and a beautiful unselfishness gathered from what they find in the humblest homes. This work of Provident Collecting at any of our missions is earnestly to be commended to those who can command a few hours' leisure on Mondays, and wish to make a beginning of helpful work among the poor. It is a simple matter-of-fact thing that has to be done, to go to certain houses where the people wish to pay over their savings, and it is not necessary to do anything else. All the rest will come naturally, as the visitor sees more of the people from week to week and gains their confidence.

The Blackfriars Mission is happy in having at its disposal a country cottage at Mitcham, where nearly a hundred of the people had the benefit last year of a pleasant visit, and the rest and refreshment of such a change from the crowded city streets to the fresher air and quiet of at least comparative country.

Among the many other beneficent activities which centre in the Mission are the Mothers' Meeting, the Young Women's Club, the Children's Happy Evenings, which provide not only abundant recreation, but classes in kindergarten, needlework, typewriting, shorthand, drill, &c. The Monday Popular Concerts, the Band of Hope and Mercy, the Boys' Own Brigade, and several other clubs, and the annual Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition. To the last we have left for mention the Sunday school, which still rejoices in having as its secretary that veteran worker, Mr. S. S. Tayler.

Last autumn the teachers passed a resolution of cordial greeting and congratulation to the Rev. W. Jellie, a former minister of Stamford-street Chapel, and now the first minister of the Unitarian Church at Auckland, New Zealand. To this resolution and the letter which accompanied it, Mr. Jellie sent a warm response, in the course of which he wrote as follows:—

"I often think of the times when I was "minister at Stamford-street. I compare "my little new Sunday-school of fifty "with our old one. I may indeed call it "mine, for I not only made it, but have "been its only teacher up to the present; "and when I and the few helpers who "carry it on meet for tea on a Sunday "afternoon to compile quarterly reports "and make plans, I am never tired of "telling them of our old monthly and "quarterly meetings. You must not think "that the gratitude is all on your side. "The relations between a minister and his "first church are not the same as those "he enters upon afterwards. He comes "to other churches with the confidence "begotten of experience. He never for-"gets the fear and trembling with which "he took up the work in his first pastor-"ate, nor the patience and forbearance "which his first people showed to his "faults and shortcomings. He never for-"gets the training he received from them. "As for me, I often think that if I have "been of any service to my fellow-"creatures and to the Unitarian cause, it "is largely owing to the fact that I was "mercifully, and against my own inclina-"tion, pitched headforemost out of college "into the onerous and exacting work of "Stamford-street.

"You have a right, in some degree, "to look upon Auckland as one more "of your daughter churches. It gives "me great joy to know that the good "work we once did together is still being "carried on and extended, and that by "men and women some of whom are "the same as when I was with you, "some of whom were boys and girls (of "whom, even when they were most "mischievous and irritating, I had great "hopes), and some of whom have been "drawn into the friendly circle since I "left. As one grows older there is no "gratification or success equal in inten-"sity to that of knowing that one has "helped the boys and girls to grow up "helpful and useful, brave and unselfish "men and women, and that is the "reward of the Sunday-school teacher. "God bless you all in your work and in "your homes, and my old college mate, "Mr. Tucker, your new minister. You "have a long, honourable history of "service and self sacrifice behind you. "May as long and honourable a history "lie before you."

Anyone who will procure a copy of the last annual report of the Mission, or, better still, will go down to Stamford-street on a Sunday or on any of the busy week-day evenings, will see how much hopeful work is carried on there, and what varied opportunities there are, there as at our other mission stations, for fresh volunteers, who are always needed in this great service.

LONDON MINISTERS' MEETING.

SIR,—Our London ministers again cordially invite all country ministers to their meeting at Essex Hall on Thursday afternoon, June 15, in the small hall.

Papers are to be read on "The Difficulties which confront Young Ministers." I may say that these opportunities of fraternising with workers in different parts of the land are valued by us in London, and may, we hope, be a pleasant and interesting interlude in the week's meetings for our visitors.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

COUNTRY COTTAGE.

SIR,—May I trespass upon your space to remind those of your readers who are interested in the Blackfriars Mission Country Home that it is now re-opened for the summer, and that I shall be glad to receive contributions from those who have not yet subscribed to it this year. Nearly a hundred people visited Mitcham, where it is situated, last season, and we hope that as many, or more, may again enjoy the advantages it affords.

"VIRTUE is not something extraneous to happiness, which we must cultivate only so far as is necessary to secure the favour of God, and then seek our happiness in other objects; virtue is in itself the source and principle of happiness, the sole means and condition of our present and our eternal well-being. Foolish, then, beyond expression, is their choice who take up with a divided allegiance, and practise virtue by halves. Frail and imperfect, after all our endeavours, must our best service be, but there will be strength in a decided resolve, and peace in the consciousness of God's blessing."—J. J. Tayler.

VOLTERRA.

HAVING been duly tugged up to Volterra, in the gathering darkness, by Amazonian Margherita and her Etruscan mules, "through good heart and Our Lady's grace, at length we gained the landing place," and "we henceforth rode sublime upon the seraph-wings of ecstasy, the secrets of the abyss to spy." We dined late amidst the din of an officers' mess. In the morning we early gazed upon the distant Tyrrhenian sea across the Tuscan archipelago, and by faith beheld the lofty mountains of Corsica. Our sensations became considerably mingled. We had read long, long ago in "The Student's Rome," the passage that said: "We now come to the Etruscans, the most singular people of the Peninsula." And now we had come to them in reality; and we had just read somewhere that, "Non sa che cosa sia etrusca antichità chi non è stato a Volterra," "He who has not been to Volterra does not know what Etruscan antiquity is." Then again, it presented a vision of the mediæval age. "C'est une vision," says M. Paul Bourget, "de Moyen âge, que cette ville serrée d'une ceinture intacte de remparts où les murailles florentines se relient aux murailles étrusques. Visiblement cette Volterra ne fut qu'un bastion suspendu sur la Maremme." Antiquity, Mediævalism, Renaissance—all strangely and vividly blended here, in this citadel town overhanging and overlooking the salt sea marshes. But the predominant sensation was Etruscan. Somewhere about the time when Lars Porsenna of Clusium (modern Chiusi, pronounced strictly Q.C.) was swearing by the Nine Gods that the great house of Tarquin should suffer wrong no more (the classical instance of a statesman putting his money on the wrong horse), as is narrated in "a lay made about the year of the city 360," by a well-known Roman historian, the cinerary urn, or casket, which we see before us in a photograph bought at the Guarnacci Museum in Volterra, was new, and the ashes placed within it were hardly cool.

It was a fact like that that made Volterra so interesting. The sensation we experienced there was of the most curious. We had felt nothing like it elsewhere. Here was the "Felathri" of the Etruscans, the "Volaterræ" of the Latins, "the lordly Volaterræ" of the historian just mentioned; "where scowls the far-famed hold piled by the hands of giants for god-like kings of old." For a thorough enjoyment of Volterra it is necessary to carry the "Lays of Ancient Rome" in the one pocket, and the "Hydriotaphia," or "Urn Burial," of Sir Thomas Browne, in the other, and Omar Khayám, to give one a proper appreciation of "time, that antiquates antiquities." Then you will be as happy as the day is long. The Guarnacci Museum will become a place lively with 600 Etruscan ghosts, who introduced arts into Horace's uncivilised country. One hardly realised at first what it was that had got into our veins. It was that vision of the Etruscan bold, King Porsenna, who was sending his messengers in all directions to call up an army that should punish Rome, and leave no single false Etruscan at home. And here they came pouring in amain from lordly Volaterræ, from sea-girt Populonia, from the proud mart of Pisæ, that had leanings for the fair-haired slaves that rode in Massilia's triremes, from where sweet Clanis (modern Chiana) wanders; from where Cortona lifts to heaven her diadem of towers. Tall are the oaks whose acorns drop in dark Auser's rill. It is difficult to see the philological connection, but this is our friend, the river Serchio, near Lucca. The harvests of Arretium (Arezzo) were left for old men to reap. Perhaps in some of those 600 ancient urns were the ashes of Ocnus of Falerii, or of Aruns of Volsinium, or of Lausulus, the rover of the sea, who went down before the dauntless Three, or perhaps they contained the ashes of their fathers: for surely it has been our privilege to behold "the best of urns and noblest variety of ashes," for one morning, at the close of Ramazán, ere the better moon arose, in that Museum rich we stood alone, "with the clay population round in rows."

Volterra is prolific in raising theories, and the fruits of theories, which are doubts. But there is no manner of doubt about its antiquity. One writer says about Volterra that according to the studies and opinions of all historians—even the most modern, which is an exquisite touch—Volterra was one of the twelve towns forming the ancient Etruscan Confederation. "M. Mommsen alone thinks otherwise." Courtesy to Mommsen constrains us to vote, however reluctantly, with the majority. Who are we to mar his sacred, everlasting calm, or violate his splendid isolation? Lord Macaulay would not take his quantities from Niebuhr, that most modern of Latin writers, when Martial, Horace, and Silius Italicus placed the accent on the first syllable of Porsenna, and not on the second. And, besides, someone says that the origins of Volterra's glorious remains are so unquestionably hidden in a thick fog of antiquity, that no history can penetrate it, and it triumphs over the baffled efforts of the historians, who are like our "blessed 'Liza's" coachman, "druv into a corner reglar, puzzled as a babe unborn." So that when we stood before the Porta all' Arco, we readily believed with Canina, or with anybody else, that it is one of the greatest monuments of Etruria. The huge blocks of stone placed on each other without cement present sufficiently weighty evidence for anyone who cares to weigh it. And the three heads ("human heads"), that have puzzled a good many other heads, placed symmetrically round the arch, whose are they? They are said to symbolise the sacrifice of human victims, in the brave days of old; or they represent the barbarous custom of cutting off the heads of the vanquished and exposing them as trophies. Others think that without any shadow of a doubt they represent Jupiter (or some Divinity or other), and the Dioscuri. We should not be surprised if they turned out to be the portraits (badly mutilated) of Ocnus of Falerii, Aruns of Volsinium, and Lausulus, the Rover of the Sea, who had been slaughtered by the dauntless Three, but were now, in the usual graceful way, exposed as scapegoats; or they might be, with even greater probability, representations of the heads of Horatius, the Captain of the Gate, together with Lartius, and Herminius, whose heads, baffled Sextus would have liked to have seen set up there. They are, however, so badly damaged that they would be beyond recognition by their friends, human or divine. And we can even believe some of the most modern "guides," who stand and tell us that they are the heads of lions; though, if that is so, they are of a breed of "beasts which Buffon never knew."

Near this gateway, and also in the neighbourhood of the ex-convent of Santa Chiara (St. Clara), great masses of the original old Etruscan walls are seen to the best advantage. They seem as massive and as unimpressionable as the everlasting hills. The arches of the gates are said to be restorations in the time, say, of Sylla and Marius, of much older arches. This seems quite unexceptionable, and the mention of Sylla recalls another pleasant thing about him, which we have on the authority of the "Hydriotaphia." It seems that Sylla adopted cremation and urn burial, not for sanitary reasons, but political. He had maltreated the dead body of Marius, and fearing retaliation in kind at the hands of his enemies, he thought it wiser to forestall any such possibility, and save himself, so as by fire. But he was not to escape altogether, "Even Sylla, that thought himself safe in his urn, could not prevent revengeful tongues, and stones thrown at his monument."

It will, no doubt, be generally remembered, at any rate by those who have recently passed their preliminary examination in Roman History, that the inhabitants of Volterra took the side of Marius against Sylla, and only submitted to the dictator after a two years' siege; but it was not the Etruscan bastion that gave way, but only the supplies that gave out. It will also be remembered that in the second Punic war, Volterra furnished corn and materials for the construction of the Roman Fleet. But it may not be generally remembered that the second Pope of Rome, counting Simon Peter as the first, came from Volterra, and was named Linus. There is a family called Cecina in Volterra. They are descended from A. Cecina, whom Cicero defended, and from his son, also A. Cecina, who took the side of Pompey, and lampooned Julius Cæsar. He also wrote a book entitled, De Etrusca disciplina, which was favourably reviewed by Pliny. Also A. Persius Flaccus, whose six satires are known to every schoolboy, was born at Volterra. And of course Francesco da Volterra came from there. His celebrated frescoes, "The History of Job," are to be seen in the Campo Santo at Pisa: in fact we saw them, but, like everything else that was very well done in the 13th or 14th century, they were attributed to Giotto, but Cavalcaselle and Crowe have set that matter right. Other great painters from Volterra were Daniele da Volterra (Ricciarelli) a disciple of Michael Angelo's, whose masterpiece is in Rome; and Baldassarre Franceschini, commonly called il Volterrano. The family of Inghirami is also an inexhaustible source of men of genius, of whom the last, but not the least, in the estimation of people interested in alabaster, was Marcello of that name. Wherever we walked in the neighbourhood of Volterra we were sure to see jutting out of the soil specimens of the native alabaster; and it is a fortunate thing for Volterra that it has such an infinite supply, in days when scowling fortresses built by giants, and 13 feet thick walls, and dizzy towers have only an antiquarian and romantic interest; in days when people like to see their grandsires cut in alabaster, or to see leaning towers of Pisa on their chimney-pieces.

We began this paper with an intention of saying something about cinerary urns in general, and about those of Volterra in particular. We find only a couple of lines left to say that they seem to be of seven classes, mostly shaped like caskets, some two or three feet long by eighteen inches broad and deep. Some are quite simple, without reliefs, with a roof-like lid, on which there is the image of the deceased reclining. The gem of these reclining figures is that of an old couple, who might well have represented some Etruscan Philemon and Baucis (the classical Darby and Joan) who probably departed together. It is the only example of two reclining figures—the old Baucis gazing lovingly into the eyes of her old Philemon. Most of them were richly adorned with bas-reliefs representing every variety of thing, from flowers to demons; some represented the soul's departure to the underworld, in all manner of symbolism—some on horseback, some in wagons, some on foot, and meeting the Shades either on foot, or on horseback, or in wagons. The Homeric stories were profusely used; the urn of which we have a photograph represents Ulysses and the Sirens, a favourite theme apparently. We need hardly stop to say that the black and red, or black and orange, Etruscan vases attracted our eyes and won our unfeigned delight. We went afterwards to visit some of the spots—gardens and orchards now, and may be they were then—whence many of the cinerary urns were extracted. And then, with many regrets

> The sad Nine

And the other hill city, with its thirteen towers, left much as they were in the Middle Ages, San Gimignano, we find is crushed out between Siena and Volterra, where it should have come in. We record, however, one sensation in San Gimignano, which like a suddenly flowering rod, dwarfed (shall we say?) all else. The Professor and I stood where we read this inscription in the Palazzo Communale, "Dante Alighieri ambasciatore per la repubblica fiorentina il giorno viii di Maggio MCCXCIX in questa Sala al comizio Sangimignanese parlò per la lega guelfa e trionfò." Dante made a speech in this room and triumphed. The Professor's face beamed: he seemed to be stepping on clouds: you could hear a pin drop: his awed whispers made me involuntarily look round expectant. He then set to work to puzzle out a piece of old Italian, the crabbed letters of which were no doubt intended to give readers a mauvais quart d'heure. They gave us half an hour. In desperation I said to our good San Gimignanese attendant, did "fai ragione" mean "fac recte?" He said it did. Which shows that if you are about to talk Italian, don't! Try Latin. But I had an experience on another occasion which procured me a doubtful compliment. I had spoken what I thought was a well-groomed sentence in Italian, and seemed to recognise a kind of comprehension in the person I addressed. With an embarrassed smile, he made, what seemed to him, a humiliating confession: he said that he did not understand Latin!

A sadder and a wiser man
I rose the morrow morn.

AMERICAN NOTES.

SEVERAL things of interest in the religious world have occurred in Boston during the past winter which I gladly report to your readers.

Early in February last came the third annual meeting of the Religious Educational Association. It was a large representative and significant gathering, composed of prominent educators from Universities, Theological Schools, and State institutions; of eminent ministers representing all denominations—Catholic, Protestant, and Jew; and of men and women of distinction, not only in Sunday-school and missionary work, but also in reformatory and philanthropic activities.

We have a difficult and important educational "problem" as well as you, but ours is very unlike yours. Our supreme enthusiasm as a people centres in our system of Free Public Schools, extendng from kindergarten to university, liberally supported by general taxation, and attended by a very large part of our children and young people. This is the mighty digestive organism by which our foreign elements are Americanised. Our supreme political conviction is that our public schools shall be free from Church control, and also free from instruction in religious dogmas.

But there is a growing realisation among all thoughtful people that the religious education of the rising generation is not in a satisfactory condition. Home instruction in Bible and Catechism has, as a rule, ceased to exist. The attendance of children and young people upon public worship in Protestant churches is rapidly decreasing, except among the Lutherans. While our Sunday-schools are numerous, active, and popular, it is generally conceded that the work done in them is very defective. No one is satisfied with the condition of the Sunday-schools. Judged by these two important tests, they, as a rule, stand condemned. (1) They are not holding the young people to vital piety, or serving as real nurseries of the church; (2) They do not give an adequate knowledge of the Bible, or lead to a large and profitable use of it. Even a comparative failure here is certainly serious and alarming.

Along with the spreading recognition of these two defects in our Sunday-schools, there is a deepening consciousness that as a people we are becoming deficient in moral principle, and that this needed conscience can only be provided by religious nurture. Prominent leaders in our civic and religious life have come simultaneously to see these facts and feel these dangers. Hence the organisation of the Religious Educational Association in Chicago in 1903.

The Boston meeting, just held, had an elaborate (almost a bewildering) programme, which extended over five days. At the main sessions, forenoons and evenings, the great central themes were discussed by the most eminent educators and clergymen of the land. The papers read were short, instructive, eloquent, earnest; the congregations were large and enthusiastic. In the afternoons, numerous sectional meetings were held, where specialists spoke to smaller groups of people interested in particular topics—many of them very concrete and practical. In all several hundred papers were read, and thousands of people were reached by the spoken words, while the papers sent their words to millions of readers throughout our land. A deep moral earnestness pervaded every message spoken. The utmost courtesy characterised every address and debate. The common desire to avoid irritating differences of dogma and emphasise the central things that unite, was happily maintained from beginning to end.

A brief description of one morning meeting will give some idea of the character of the gathering. President Charles Cuthbert Hall (Presbyterian), of Union Theological Seminary, New York City, presided. Rev. Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, president of the American Unitarian Association, conducted the devotional service; and this was in the Park Street Church, known locally as "brimstone corner!" President G. Stanley Hall (not closely affiliated with any Church), of Clark University, and author of the great work on "Adolescence"; Rev. Dr. Burr, an eminent Baptist; Prof. Geo. A. Coe, a Methodist author of fast widening fame; Prof. Endicott, headmaster of a prominent Episcopal school for boys; and Prof. Martin, long connected with the public schools of Massachusetts, read papers of great value, on such topics as "Religion in the Home." "Opportunities for Larger Educational Work in Religion among Young Men"; "Religious Training as a Vital Process"; "The Relation of the Public Schools to Public Morality"; and "The Place of Positive Religion in Education."

The general object of the Association is not to formulate opinions, to pass judgment upon methods now in use, or to create new machinery for religious education. Its purpose is deeper and more important:—To create, direct, and educate a public sentiment, which, operating in all the Churches, and in all homes, shall give to religious nurture and training a new prominence, a new dignity, and a new effectiveness.

The significance of the great gathering lay, not in the number and distinction of its delegates; not in the eloquence and earnestness of its speakers; not in the prominence given to it by the editors and officials of the Commonwealth; not even in its inclusive and catholic spirit, but rather in the strong and uniform emphasis which it put upon the educational method as the normal method of the religious life. The movement means a gain in both directions; the ideal of education is broadened to include the whole being—the method of growth is made central in religion.

The old dogmas, such as total depravity, miraculous conversion, a convulisive profession of theologic belief are nowhere specifically denounced or denied, but everywhere ignored and by implication set aside. Well might they be passed by in silence and allowed to die in obscurity! The central postulates everywhere coming to expression were these: Religion a life native to man, who must be trained into a realisation of his spiritual possibilities by a wise comprehensive, regenerative, educational process: Christianity vital, natural and rational rather than speculative and mystical; the Bible a book for religious training and inspiration, to be used to generate moral power; the Church a school of life to incarnate truth and love in character; Jesus, a supreme educating personality to quicken men in the divine life. All this was quite remarkable and very hopeful.

The Dawson meetings soon followed the Association here in Boston. They are still being held in other parts of the country, quite unlike the Moody revivals of former days. As Mr. Dawson is one of your London notables, he needs no introduction to your readers. The meetings held here were strictly evangelistic. That is, they aimed to arouse men to a sense of sin, and a desire for godliness, by presenting the Gospel of Jesus in its simplicity, and also in its power. There was no noisy sensationalism; no exciting appeal to fear; no dramatic counterbalancing of the wrath of God and the blood of Jesus; no spectacular parading of converted sinners; and yet there was a deep feeling of personal consecration in these meetings, for the judgments of God as well as His mercies were emphasised. Truly evangelistic then, but on a higher plane than the old revivals.

We have been reading of your Welsh revival and your London Carnival of Unreason led by Dr. Torrey. We have not escaped somewhat similar paroxysms of religious delirium, but they have visited us only in spots. Pittsburgh and Louisville have experienced certain noisy, unreasoning, intolerant, fear-engendering excitements, manufactured and manipulated under the name of religion. A personal devil, the eternal damnation of unbelievers, the wrath of God, the blood of Christ, the pestilential blasphemy of Unitarians, the atheism of modern science, the destruction of the Bible by Higher Criticism; this curious compound was once more set forth as the Gospel of Jesus. Some persons were probably moved "to quit their meanness" by these appeals, but true religion was widely and sadly disgraced in the eyes of thoughtful people.

Very unlike this religious hysteria were Mr. Dawson's meetings in Boston; they were, apparently, fully arranged more to move the churches to deeper and higher living, and to strike the keynote of a new evangelism, as an example and inspiration for preachers in general, than to gather a large but promiscuous crowd of converts. In a very good sense they were intended as "a normal institute" to illustrate the spirit and method of the new evangelism. The preaching of Mr. Dawson, as elegant in diction as it was earnest in spirit, was a supreme illustration of a simple but searching appeal to the reason and the conscience in behalf of the spiritual life: an evangel full of moral fervour, tender humanity, intense love of Jesus, and deep reverence for God. His "sweet reasonableness" profoundly moved the people, but not to noisy shouting.

The chief and permanent results of the Dawson evangelism will probably be found in the following directions:—(1) In the broadening of the spirit and method of evangelistic work. The open mind, the forward look, the inclusive spirit have been wedded to profound conviction and spiritual fervour. There is no reason why religious enthusiasm should be ignorant and superstitious; there is no reason why science and scholarship should be cold and non-religious. Let piety and culture go hand in hand. Take the heart of the Gospel of Jesus, what reason cannot discredit, and what science cannot overthrow, and make it a creative power in the human life. Accept the great discoveries, and make of them an Evangel to deliver men from sin and sorrow.

(2) Another result will probably be the change in the preaching of many ministers—a result akin to the one described above. The sermons will become more simple and more spiritual; more human and more rational; more ethical and more sympathetic. It is well to avoid being bookish, academic, dogmatic, scholastic, and secular in the pulpit; but preaching can never be too intellectual, if the intellect is on fire with spiritual enthusiasm. We never need to fear that we shall be too emotional in our preaching if we see to it that feeling runs on the stepping stones of fact, and keeps to the practical tasks of conduct and service.

We Unitarians may well take satisfaction in the work of Mr. Dawson. His words at the closing meeting in Boston, in praise of Channing, and especially in praise of Channing's teachings about Jesus, were as fine as they were unusual. He said that the reading of Channing's exposition of Jesus marked a great spiritual illumination in his own life, and that he had never since found any more helpful words respecting the Master. Probably the first time an Evangelist ever praised Channing's views of Jesus at a revival meeting! A most remarkable evidence of religious progress! And one of Mr. Dawson's statements that made the profoundest impression was this: "As Christ was man, so may all men be as Christ," carrying emphasis away from mere belief in Christ to "Christ-likeness" as the essence of Christianity; indeed, a new, but welcome, note to hear in a revival meeting. Therefore, we Unitarians may well take satisfaction in Mr. Dawson's ministry and message, but we must not stop here. The deeper question before us is this: Shall we not learn from him how to make our own message more effective? We need to do something more than to sit with folded hands in satisfaction that the world is moving our way theologically. We ought seriously to face the problem: What more ought we to do to conquer sin, to bring in the kingdom, to revive the work of religion among men?

Any genuine revival of religion must be based upon certain fundamental facts. (1) Religious work to have adequate authority and creative power must assume the real universe discovered by science. The evangelist must not discredit piety by his ignorance of nature. The pulpit must accept the real universe known to the school boy and the man in the street. (2) Taking another step in the same line, the minister of religion must accept the New Bible, and frankly re-tell the story of Jesus from the vantage ground of these discoveries, making it thereby a vastly more inspiring and helpful story. Every traditional error incorporated in the teaching of the Gospel lessens the power of Jesus over thoughtful minds and bars reasonable men out of the church. (3) There can be no adequate evangelism without absolute sincerity in the handling of religious topics. The widespread hedging, the ruinous duplicity, the timid compromise which covers, but does not conceal, a real infidelity; these things must give way to perfect frankness and brave plain speaking. (4) Religion to become an evangel must evolve a conscience sufficiently powerful to restrain unjust money-making, to discipline men and women in the simple moralities that insure pure homes and honest trade, and to awaken the higher patriotism that shall make for civic righteousness rather than for the plunder of the weak under the disguise of national glory. On no other basis can a revival of religion worth having be reached.

SALVATION.

WHERE health is there is harmony, we say;
And so, his open soul, being sane and strong,
He wrought his passion in immortal song,
And gave another glory to the day:
A promise came to those amid the grey
Sad twilight of disease; and woe and wrong
Looked up to joy and rectitude, with long
And ever-brightening wonder, till the way
Was clear and straight.
Then rapture found a voice;
The hills and valleys sang together, trees,
And winds and flowers, the merry birds and bees
Joined in the ecstatic roundelay, "Rejoice!"
And man replied, with all the isles and seas,
"The holy living God is now our choice."

QUOTING the terrible epitaph on a certain Mrs. Bond, who died in 1768, said to be taken from a monument in a Cumberland churchyard, last Saturday's Spectator preached a salutary sermon on the dangers of "A Patchwork Character," and concluded by laying down three rules for the person who desires to be amiable. The second and third are as follows:—"The second is not to differ about matters "of no importance, not to debase sincerity "into contradictoriness, and not to set for "other people a standard which it is unreasonable to suppose, from previous experience of their characters, that they "will ever reach. The third is never to "let his good principle interfere with some "one else's harmless privilege, to remember that praise is a positive necessity "to the spiritual and mental development "of the young, and that injudicious blame "acts as a blight. Mrs. Bond did not "know the importance of these things, "and therefore, as poor people say, she "metaphorically 'broke up her home,' "and caused as much misery as though "she had run away, or taken to drink, or "played ducks and drakes with her "husband's fortune, not by doing anything wrong, not even by neglecting her "duty, not by any of the usual methods, "but simply by being disagreeable."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bolton: Bank Street.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last, the preacher morning and evening being the Rev. Douglas Walmsley, of Belfast, and formerly of Bury. Special anthems were rendered by the choir. In the afternoon there was a scholars' service, conducted by Mr. Thomas Harwood, at which an address containing many personal reminiscences of Bank-street school was delivered by Mr. Charles Nicholson. The collections amounted to upwards of £98.

Chester.—The annual meeting of the congregation of Matthew Henry's Chapel was held in the schoolroom on the 31st ult., under the presidency of the Rev. H. E. Haycock. Satisfactory progress in the religious, philanthropic, educational and social work of the chapel was reported. The average attendance at the services and in the Sunday school was higher than last year. The Social Union, Boys' Club, Children's Guild, Sewing Class, Savings Bank, Menander (Amateur Dramatic) Club, and the Gymnastic Classes had all done good work. A vote of thanks was passed to the members of the choir, the teachers, flower committee, the secretary (Mr. A. Orrett), and the treasurer (Mr. W. Orrett), and other workers.

Dromore.—Special services were held on Sunday last to inaugurate a new organ, which has been erected at a cost of £350. At the same time the meeting-house has undergone general renovation, and two beautiful memorial windows to relatives have been placed on either side of the pulpit by Mr. Henry Hobart, C.E., the subjects represented being "The Guardian Angel," "The Good Shepherd," "The Sower," and "Christ Blessing the Children." The services were conducted by Principal Gordon, and special music was rendered by the choir. There were large congregations, including many visitors from Belfast and intermediate towns, and members of neighbouring churches. The Rev. A. Davison, minister of the congregation, thanked their friends from other churches for their presence and support on that occasion.

Evesham.—The monthly ministers' meeting was held in the Oat-street Chapel, on Wednesday, the 31st ult., the service being conducted by the Rev. W. C. Hall, of Small Heath. Mr. Geoffrey New afterwards presided at the luncheon in the schoolroom, when the preacher's health was proposed by Mr. W. Smith. The chairman proposed "The Ministers' Meeting," to which the Rev. I. Wrigley responded. "Civil and Religious Liberty" was proposed by the Rev. J. Wood, and "The Evesham Congregation" by the Rev. J. C. Street, Mr. A. H. Martin responding. The company afterwards went up to Mrs. Cliff's house, where they were entertained to tea.

Hyde: Flowery Field.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on May 21 by the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., of Longsight.

Ipswich.—The Rev. Lucking Tavener has just completed a course of six Sunday evening sermons entitled "The Modern Search for God." Taking for his starting point the French Revolution, Mr. Tavener showed its effect upon the greatest intellects of the nineteenth century in the realms of literature and science. Shelley, Wordsworth, Carlyle, and Dr. Martineau were given as examples in literature; Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, and Herbert Spencer represented the scientific aspect. The whole course was well attended.

Irish Sunday School Conference.—On Saturday, June 3, under the auspices of the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Churches, a conference of Sunday-school teachers and others interested in the religious training of the young was held at the First Presbyterian Church, Holywood, the president, the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, in the chair. Some 400 persons were present from various associated churches in counties Down and Antrim, including nearly 20 ministers. After the singing of S. Longfellow's hymn, "O, Life that maketh all things new," a paper was read by Mr. James Steel, of Belfast, on "How shall the Teacher best meet the need of the scholar?" and an interesting discussion followed, in which the Rev. J. Kennedy, Mr. J.

Mulligan, Miss Mellone, the Rev. J. McCleery, the Rev. J. A. Kelly, Miss Lindsay, and the Rev. R. M. King took part. The Rev. W. G. Marsden proposed, and the Rev. A. Davison seconded, a vote of thanks to Mr. Steel, which was carried with enthusiasm, and having been duly acknowledged, the President delivered an address on "General aims and possibilities of our work." He noted the prevailing religious aims of the Irish Sunday-schools, and said they should think also of the relation of the individual scholar to the future of the congregation, for their congregations must grow from within. He then spoke of the educational value of the Bible, and of the fresh interest awakened in it by modern knowledge. They should see to it also that their scholars had some knowledge of the history of their own country. He concluded by counselling closer intercourse between the scholars of their different schools. Mr. John Smith moved, and the Rev. D. Lyttle seconded, a vote of thanks to the President and the Holywood congregation. The Rev. A. O. Ashworth, convener of the conference, announced that an invitation had been received from the Templepatrick congregation to hold the next annual conference there. A bountiful tea was afterwards served in the schoolroom and on the grass outside, and the opportunity for sociability was much enjoyed.

Lancaster.—A sale of work held on May 31 and June 1 and 2, in aid of proposed structural alterations, and to pay off a small debt incurred by a new heating apparatus, realised about £90. Mrs. N. W. Helme, the wife of the member of Parliament for the Lancaster Division, opened the sale on the first day, and Mrs. Heald, the Mayoress of Lancaster, opened on the second day. The Lancaster Observer makes the following interesting editorial comment:—"The fact that religious differences are not so acute locally as they used to be, or, as Mr. Robert Brash said yesterday, 'that the world was growing wiser,' has been illustrated this week in the support given to the sale of work promoted by the Unitarian congregation, of which the Rev. J. C. Pollard is the respected minister. Mrs. Helme and Mrs. Heald, the wives of a leading Wesleyan and of an Anglican, have opened the sale on successive days; and, although the Member for the division and the Mayor were not able to be present, as announced, they were all represented. Rev. J. F. Cowley, Congregationalist minister, took part in Wednesday's proceedings. It is quite true, as Mr. Brash remarked, that not many years ago the spirit animating religious people would have led to a boycott of the Unitarian sale of work by other denominations. There are higher things in religion than sectarian strife and animosity, and the object lesson of this week is valuable."

London: Essex Church.—The annual drill display in connection with the girls' classes and club was held on June 1, and repeated on June 3. There was a large attendance of young people, parents and friends, including Mrs. Ceredig Jones, who formerly taught the girls drill. The display of dumb bell exercises, figure marching, skipping, parallel bars, rings, balls, and mass drill was exceedingly good. The behaviour and deportment of the girls, both junior and senior, could hardly have been better. At the meeting, over which the Rev. F. K. Freeston presided, high praise was accorded to Miss Violet Preston, Miss D. Preston, and the other workers for their services during the year. The prizes for needlework were presented by Mrs. David, those for attendance and efficiency in drill by Mr. C. W. Blackman.

London: Kentish Town.—The Jubilee Bazaar, which was opened on the first day, as we reported last week, by Mrs. Wallace Bruce, and on the second day by Miss Tagart, realised a total, including donations, of £120.

No sublimer spectacle do I know on earth than the faculties of a grand and passionate nature as in a Socrates or a Paul, falling into stillness before the face of God, and by the awful light of his countenance turned from a stormy nobleness into a loving and working power. It is a spectacle which emerges painfully and rarely from the battle of the will, spontaneously and often from the repose of faith.—Martineau.

The Sunday Magazine this month has the first instalment of an article by Sir Edward Russell on "The Religious Life of Liverpool since 1850." As the few conspicuous men who have won fame for Liverpool in that connection, he names M'Neile, Raffles, Stowell Brown, Birrell, Martineau Thom, and Beard: "These great preachers stamped character upon their respective denominations"; and then he goes on to speak more particularly of Dr. John Watson and Dr. Raffles, of whom, as well as Dr. M'Neile, portraits are given.

As we look back upon our past days we may discern many signs that they have been guided by a wisdom greater than our own. If we had had our own way we should have avoided many troublesome tasks, but those tasks, when well discharged, have brought rich spiritual blessings in their train.—H. W. Crosskey.

THE aim in life is what the backbone is to the body: without it we are invertebrate, belonging to some lower order of beings not yet man.—W. C. Gannett.

As large a portion of well-being may be sacrificed by an act of wilful extravagance, as by the commission of a dishonesty; and were it of a nature to be definable by law, would merit as severe a punishment. Shall anything then deter us from saying that such self-indulgence is a thief?—Martineau.

WHY do we not remember that He is a Spirit; that He is of an infinite forbearance and long-suffering; that He is large enough to hold in harmony much that we are too small to embrace; that many things that seem incompatible to us are not incompatible to Him: that He looks upon the heart, and judges righteous judgment; that He forgives us though He knows us; nay, let us sometimes humbly hope, forgives us because He knows us.—J. H. Thom.

WHIT-WEEK ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

BEAUTIFUL summer weather has made the week's meetings specially delightful, and, if the attendance at the annual service was not quite so large as in other years, the spirit of the gatherings has been full of hope. Contributions of permanent interest and value have been made to our common store of knowledge and inspiration, and the week will be specially memorable for Professor HENRY JONES'S Essex Hall Lecture.

The service in Little Portland-street Chapel on Wednesday was conducted by the Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS, whose sermon is published in our present issue. The service opened with that ever-welcome hymn of THOMAS HORNBLOWER GILL'S—and the "Jubilate" was sung to the special music by Mr. John Harrison, who presided as usual at the organ. The week's proceedings followed the accustomed order, with a somewhat exhausting series of meetings and interludes of pleasant sociability. One welcome addition to the latter was the luncheon given by the London Laymen's Club to the representatives of congregations and other friends, and Thursday ended as usual with the Conversazione in the Portman Rooms, where the guests were received by the President, the Right Hon. WILLIAM KENRICK, and Mrs. KENRICK.

We come unto our fathers' God.

Dr. MELLONE'S address on "Two Centenaries: James Martineau and Francis William Newman"; and the paper by the Rev. F. K. FREESTON, on "The Decline of Public Worship," we must reserve for future publication.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE week's meetings began very happily on Tuesday with the proceedings of the Sunday School Association. There was a meeting of delegates from District Associations for conference in the morning, and a luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant, which was largely attended, and over which the President of the Association, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, presided.

The annual meeting was held in the afternoon at Essex Hall, the President in the chair, and began with the hearty singing of the following hymn, to the tune 299, A. and M. :—

"The Singers go Before."

STILL, as in ancient Salem's day
Went forth the minstrelsy,
Thy joyous singers lead the way,
O God of joy, to thee.

Blessed are they who bless thy name
With hearts in sweet accord,
The herald voices that proclaim
The Kingdom of the Lord!

Theirs is the song that never dies,
Of love, and joy, and trust—
Immortal still while temples rise
And crumble into dust.

Lord of that blest Jerusalem
Where dwell the pure and free,
Give us a heart to sing with them
Who lead the way to thee.

And, when our pilgrimage is o'er,
Still may our children raise
This pilgrim-music, evermore,
Of love and joy and praise.

W. G. T. 1905.

Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., who completes this year twenty-five years of service as treasurer of the Association, presented the accounts. He noted an adverse balance of £25 with the cheerful confidence that members would make it up during the week by increased subscriptions. The total of subscriptions and donations received was £956 12s. 5d., and from the sale of publications £956 12s. 5d. had been received, an increase of some £80 on last year, largely due to the activity of the Rev. F. Allen as publications agent for six months. On the other side there was a new item of £58 4s. for the printing of the Monthly Notes for Teachers, which he felt sure had been much appreciated. Why, he asked, was that Society to be supported? They were not merely booksellers, whose object it was to make a profit, or he certainly should not have been their treasurer for all those years. They were charged with the religious education of the children, and the duty was pressed upon them with special urgency at the present time. The members of that Association had declared for secular education in the day schools and while they were aware that he was in the minority on that subject, and as President of the National Conference had recorded his dissent from such a resolution, he yet impressed it upon them that if that change was to be made in the day-school, still more clearly and imperatively it became the duty of the congregations to maintain their Sunday-schools; and there was the more necessity for well-equipped schools with good and efficient teachers. He was afraid that the children in their Board Schools would not receive much religious education at home, and therefore they must look to it that the teachers in their Sunday-schools knew how to teach and to maintain order, that their lessons might be of real value. And what, he asked, about the children in their Unitarian homes? Was it wholly true that every Unitarian parent taught his children religion at home? There was need that the ministers should have classes of the children of their congregations, and that books should get into the homes, which parents as well as children should read. It was to meet those needs that their Association had to work, and that was why for twenty-five years he had been their treasurer. That was the real reason why they must support that Association, because the Sunday-schools of the future would be bound to play a more definite and useful part in the education of future generations than ever before, and because they must provide the needed books for religious teaching in their homes.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, hon. secretary, in presenting the annual report, said that he had received two letters from old friends, regretting their inability to be present, and their continued warm interest in the work—the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who fifty-four years ago had represented the Manchester District Association at their meeting, and again after fifty years was with them at their anniversary, and Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough. Mr. Pritchard drew attention to some points in the report, and particularly to the appended statistics, which, he said, would be still more valuable, if they could be sure that they were all accurate.

THE REPORT.

The report opened with references to the religious education problem, and an appeal to schools seriously to consider how far they were equipped and prepared to take their part in such systematic work, supposing the responsibility for religious teaching to be taken entirely out of the hands of day school teachers and left to the Sunday-schools of the country. Carefully prepared statistics showed that in 291 schools making returns there were 3,585 teachers and 36,034 scholars on the books, with 9,876 scholars above 16. With the exception of 23 unattached and 3 Colonial schoo's, the rest were grouped under 15 local unions. On finance the report showed receipts from subscriptions and donations £281 4s. 4d., and £949 10s. 5d. for sale of publications, and an adverse balance of £25 1s. 5d. The publication of Young Days and Monthly Notes had been continued, and among new publications had been a volume of "Bible Stories Retold," by Dr. Brooke Herford, a set of card lessons on "Scenes and Stories from the Life of Jesus," by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, and "Nine Parables set to Music," by Mr. Hugh Atkins. Of Dr. Herford's book a school edition was to be published, also new editions of the first series of the Rev. J. C. Hirst's "Half Hours with the Parables," and Dr. Beard's "Ten Lessons on Religion." A selection in one volume of the "Short Sermons to Children" by Three Cousins had been issued. The report promised a short biography of Dr. Martineau for young people by the Rev. Alfred Hall, and a new book by Miss Marian Pritchard, somewhat on the lines of the Rev. J. T. Marriott's "Our Unitarian Faith."

The proceedings of the fourth Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers at Manchester College, Oxford, in July, 1904, were chronicled, and the hope expressed that a similar session would be held in 1906. One admirable piece of work had the Nature Lessons by the Rev. Thomas Robinson given in various schools throughout the country, and the Rev. F. Allen's work for six months as Publication Agent had been widely appreciated and had brought the books and the work of the Association more definitely to the notice of many of the schools. Particulars as to lantern slides and notes from the District Unions were appended to the report.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, referred to the Emslie portrait of Dr. Martineau, which has been placed in the centre of the wall over the platform, and which, he said, they were proud to see in that place. Dr. Martineau was a great friend of Sunday-schools, and himself a teacher for many years and a superintendent long after he had risen to more than British fame. That picture ought to be an inspiration to them. He, at whose feet they sat with reverence, had laid upon himself humble duties, and although they could not presume to call him comrade, there was no title he would have rejoiced in more than that of fellow-worker with them as teachers. He referred also to the passing away of that teacher, taught by Martineau, who had helped many to receive the teaching of Martineau, as they otherwise could not have done. He also had been a great friend and helper in their work, and an inspirer of many. Mr. Armstrong had often stood upon that platform. When they remembered him, they must take heart of courage, and if ever they were slack in their work they must feel rebuked. For all that he had done for them they were profoundly grateful. There were those who thought that national interest lay in the way of commerce, others that it lay in military expansion, but, for his own part, he said that the greatest of all national interests was the character of the peoples governed. No increase of empire could be of any worth which did not secure that high interest of the character of the people. And what chiefly counted in that world, in which righteousness was supreme, was the character of the people who ruled. When he looked around for self-devotion to teaching, and in their homes looked for the presence of the literature which ought to be of such influence for good, he confessed to some discouragement. They seemed to be falling below the standard previously reached. The number of their teachers was less, and yet there was great hope in the fact that the number of scholars over sixteen had largely increased during the past few years. At the New Year, thinking of the large number of their elder scholars, of whom they reckoned that there were some 10,000, he had been anxious to do something which might strengthen the feeling of solidarity among them, and he had written a letter of New Year's greeting which had been sent to them all. The response showed that it had been found helpful, and he thought that effort might be further developed in future years. In conclusion he said he felt that no part of his work as a minister was more joyful, more fruitful and inspiring, and educative to himself, than the work he had done among the young people, and he desired to encourage his brother ministers not to deprive themselves of a share in that great work.

The Rev. J. CROWTHER HIRST, in seconding, said that the responsibilities of Sunday schools were likely to increase rather than decrease. They must encourage the present teachers to do their work more efficiently. In the matter of ministers' preparation classes they knew that the great difficulty was to get the teachers to attend, and he told of a plan they were adopting in Liverpool, by which schools would be grouped, and courses of Biblical lessons would be given at certain centres, with a printed syllabus to be distributed to every teacher. He referred to the great loss they had sustained in the passing of Mr. Armstrong. That was most keenly felt in Liverpool. He was their natural leader, and before their eyes an ever-inspiring example. No one could come near him without being affected by the simple earnestness, the high moral ideal so plainly seen in his life. When he passed away, they felt that not only their churches and schools, but every individual had lost a valued friend. Still they tried to do their work, in which he was so much interested, and those central preparation classes he hoped would be a great help to the teachers. But while they had thus a high ideal of efficiency as teachers, he hoped they would never forget that some of the best Sunday-school work had been done by men and women almost entirely uneducated. It might be a shame that the educated people did not come forward more, but at any rate in times past they had had noble men and women, who could not teach much book knowledge, but by their moral influence, the example of their own life, had helped their scholars to high ideals, and drawn out in them the best elements of character. He begged teachers not to be discouraged, even if they felt they did not reach a high standard in their teaching. The personal influence of the teacher, in whom there was the true spirit of self-sacrifice, was the essential thing.

The resolution having been unanimously adopted, the Rev. J. MCDOWELL moved, and the Rev. WALTER LLOYD seconded, a vote of thanks to the officers and committee for their services, and the election for the new year, with the Rev. Charles Hargrove as President, the other officers being reappointed.

The PRESIDENT then moved:—That the hearty welcome of this meeting be given to the following representatives of Sunday-school Societies:—American Sunday-schools, Rev. F. L. Phalen; Irish Non-Subscribing Association, Rev. S. H. Mellone, B.A., D.Sc.: Scottish Sunday School Union, Rev. R. B. Drummond, B.A.; South Wales Association, Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A.; South-East Wales Society, Rev. David Rees; Bolton District Union, Rev. J. J. Wright; Liverpool Sunday School Society, Miss A. Hall; London Sunday School Society, Mr. A. Barnes; Manchester District Association, Rev. W. Holmshaw; Midland Association, Rev. E. A. Voysey, M.A.; Newcastle District Association, Rev. W. H. Lambelle; North Cheshire Union, Rev. W. Harrison; North-East Lancashire Union, Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A.; North Midland Association, Rev. E. G. Evans, B.A.; Sheffield and District Union, Rev. H. Dawtrey, B.A.; Southern Union, Rev. Clement E. Pike; South Cheshire Union, Rev. James C. Street; South-Eastern Union, Rev. Frederic Allen; Western Union, Rev. John McDowell; Yorkshire Union, Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A.

To this the Rev. F. L. PHALEN, of Worcester, Mass., and the Rev. R. J. JONES, of Aberdare, briefly responded. Mr. Phalen spoke of the warm brotherly feeling which united their workers on both sides of the Atlantic, and told of a teacher who, coming unprepared to a class, had asked, "What shall I speak about?" and a little girl replied, "Speak about a minute." He concluded by repeating the aspiration that the Stars and Stripes and the Union Jack might fly together for ever, and that Unitarians might work together to greater and greater issues: "for the world moves, brethren, as God moves in it."

MISS PUNNETTT'S ADDRESS.

After an adjournment for tea, the chair was taken by Miss Marian Pritchard, last year's president, who had been prevented by illness from presiding then. They were grateful, she said, for the opportunity of learning from Miss Punnett, who had had so much experience at a Cambridge training college, and now under the County Council.

Miss PUNNETT then gave a delightful address on "How to make our lessons interesting." That, she said, was pre-eminently a subject for discussion: What she proposed to do was to offer a few considerations as to the nature of interest, which, if followed to a practical conclusion by a wise teacher, would give valuable hints as to how to make lessons interesting. There were various, even contradictory views, as to interest. Some said the teacher was everything, and a good teacher could make any subject, even a broom-stick, interesting. Others said the subject was everything, and that if the right kind of subject was found any teacher could make it interesting. Others, like a recent writer in the Westminster Gazette, complained that a great deal too much was made of interest, and the craving for it was spoiling their teaching. To get at the real meaning of interest she took a concrete instance. Supposing they had to give a lesson to a class of children about twelve years old on the value of speaking the truth, there were three methods they might pursue, (1) They might treat it in a general way, asking in the abstract what was meant by truth speaking, and comparing it to other virtues, such as courage and self-respect. (2) Or they might refer the children specifically to certain bits of their own experience and so bring out its meaning. (3) Or they might tell a story, in which the different points to be taught were brought in. And that third method, for that particular class, with such a subject and children of that age, she felt to be the best.

The story to be the basis for a lesson should be vividly told, and then there might be some discussion, especially if the story raised a question or two, as to what they would do in such and such a case, or how they would have felt in certain circumstances.

They might find some interest by the other methods, but by the first method it would not be sustained, and by the second, though their interest would be aroused, in some cases even too acutely, they would grow restive, for children resented being told their faults in such a way. Elder children, on the other hand, might find the first method more interesting. In the case they were considering, the third method was the most interesting, because the children's minds were really more active. To secure their activity (which was the secret of interest) by the first method, required a good deal of experience of life, which only the elders had; but in the third method, though they might say the children had "just to listen" to a story, they were by no means passive, at every point they were actively bringing up little details of their own experience of life to make the pictures of the story for themselves. That was true even of the most extravagant fairy story. They could not picture even the most wonderful things, without drawing on their own experience. As a rule the reason why children objected to a story with a moral was that it took out of their hands what they should do for themselves. They did not know that was the reason, but so it was. With any class the great thing to ask was how they could make sure that the children's minds should be active. There must always be appeal to something already in their minds, and, if possible, they must get some emotion connected with it. With children that was best secured by the story method, which made the activity picturesque for them, and left them to make the application for themselves.

No one could tell teachers how to do it. They must be skilful, and practise till they found out for themselves, by sympathy coming to understand the children. If interest flagged they should stop the story and ask some question—anything to arouse their activity, and then the story could go on. So in the matter of interest, it was not the story alone, or the teacher alone, that secured success, but both together. True interest could never be dangerous for good teaching. It was the one thing likely to lead to really good results. And the desire that the children should carry out their thinking into action was of the utmost consequence; but could they ever do that if they found the lessons dull?

The Rev. W. HOLMSHAW, from his experience as a teacher, trained to the profession, endorsed all that Miss Punnett had said on the subject of interest. To avoid dulness, he said, they must know what they wanted to teach, and they must endeavour to see into the minds of the children. Having found out what they knew, the teacher should begin from that point. On any subject, the children would be eager to contribute what they knew, and so interest was sustained, and the teacher could go on to add what he wanted them to know. Then, if the whole ground was gone over again, interest would be sustained to the end.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT also agreed entirely with what Miss Punnett had said. The great thing was to arouse mental and moral activity in those they wished to teach; and they must remember that children could not be long interested in one subject. It was well to shorten a lesson, and then after a break to go on to another lesson.

The Rev. W. HARRISON, and doubtless others also, were ready to carry on the discussion, but the available time had elapsed, and a vote of thanks to the President, to Miss Pritchard, and Miss Punnett and all who had contributed to the usefulness and success of the meeting, moved by the Rev. H. S. Solly and seconded by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, brought the meeting to a close.

THE new volume in Williams & Norgate's Crown Theological Library will consist of eleven Essays, and be entitled "The Child and Religion." Prof. Henry Jones, of Glasgow University, will write on The Child and Heredity; Prof. C. T. Ladd, of Yale University, on The Child's Capacity for Religion; Dr. J. Cynddlan Jones on Conversion of Children; Dr. R. F. Horton on Reigious Training of Children in the Free Churches; Dr. George Hill on Baptists and the Children; Dr. Agar Beet on The Child and the Bible, &c. The volume is edited by the Rev. Thomas Stephens, and will consist of nearly 400 pages, and be published at 6s.

THE ESSEX HALL LECTURE.

"THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL IN TENNYSON AND BROWNING."

ESSEX Hall was crowded on Tuesday evening, and we fear that a good many people had to be turned away disappointed, when Professor Henry Jones gave the Essex Hall Lecture on the above subject. The lecture will be published as speedily as possible in book form, and what we can give here is only a very imperfect abstract. But even the complete lecture, when printed, cannot give those delightful interpolations of vivid illustration and comment which set the lecturer so thoroughly in accord with his hearers, and added so much to the force and interest of the lecture. Foot notes may perhaps preserve something of their substance. Those of our readers who do not already know it we strongly advise to get and read Professor Jones's book on "Browning as a Philosopher and Religious Teacher" (Maclehose, 6s. net). The book was first published in 1891, and has been through several editions.

The President of the Association, the Right Hon. William Kenrick, took the chair, and, in introducing Professor Jones, made the following statement:—

The Essex Hall Lecture was established by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association twelve years ago, with the object of providing an opportunity for a specially selected lecturer to present his free and open thoughts on some topic of deep religious interest. The majority of the lecturers have belonged to or been associated with the Unitarian body, but the Committee have not restricted their choice to Unitarians. Last year a distinguished German Professor, Dr. H. H. Wendt, of Jena, delivered the lecture; this year we welcome the Professor of Moral Philosophy at the University of Glasgow, Professor Henry Jones, whose subject is the Immortality of the Soul as revealed in the poetry of Browning and Tennyson.

At the conclusion of the lecture the President proposed a vote of thanks to Professor Jones, which was carried by loud acclamation, and he, in acknowledging his hearers' kindness, proposed a vote of thanks to the President, which was similarly passed.

THE LECTURE.

"The Immortality of the Soul," said Professor Jones at the beginning of his lecture, "is one of those grave matters on which men of refinement are naturally reticent. They break their silence, as a rule, only when they are deeply moved." So it was with Plato, when the death of Socrates led him to speak of immortality as almost no other has done. The death of Arthur Hallam stirred the depths of Tennyson's nature, and brought the wild grief, the sustained reflection, and the solemn joy of "In Memoriam"; and though Browning was habitually less reticent, and the speculative impulse in him was more daring, so that he often spoke of the future life during the fifty years or more of his poetic labour, it was the death of his young friend at La Saissiaz which stirred his knightly spirit to put on its armour, to challenge his own faith, to dare his own doubts of immortality.

There were those, indeed, even among the best and wisest, who maintained that we should not concern ourselves with this matter, but should think simply of living the present life well; for to the man who is thus within his duty "Death does not count." He could not withhold his reverence from such men, the lecturer said, men strong with the strength of moral faith, who ranked loyalty to simple truth, even when truth was silent, above whatever peace those hopes might bring which might turn out false. And Plato had drawn a marvellous picture of his Master earnestly pleading with those to whom he spoke, that even in that last hour they should be thinking of the truth and not of Socrates. "Agree with me, if I seem to you to be speaking the truth; or, if not, withstand me might and main, that I may not deceive you, as well as myself, in my enthusiasm, and, like the bee, leave my sting in you before I die."

Yet they ought not to refrain from such questionings, and indeed he doubted if they could. Nor ought they to be reconciled to ignorance, otherwise they might be brought at last to the crudest superstition, and that was not good. And, in fact, it was only by coming to a reckoning with Death that those magnificent convictions could be gained by man. That "Death does not count," that "Come what may, the duty of the moment sufficeth," were not beliefs which could be possessed by the thoughtless. Those who gained them knew that there were things more to be feared than death. They had put the thought of death in so vast and so spiritual a context that its significance was dwarfed; and all the meaning that remained for it was not natural any more, but spiritual. That was what had been done by those two great poets. Each challenged death, and found that, provided the moral world stood and God remained, it could not itself mean much, and what it did mean was good. To understand that, was to appropriate their thought upon that question of the immortality of the soul.

There were two ways of considering what they said on the subject. One might examine their utterances critically to bring out the similarities and differences of their faith, after the manner of a commentator; or one might dwell upon the broad features of their belief to discover the basis on which they made it rest, to find out what validity, what value for others there was in their trust. That was the method he should follow. He should look to the poets for help in the contemplation of the problem of death and immortality for himself, dealing with them as teachers of truth rather than as poets or ministers of beauty.

The great thing that impressed the student of Tennyson and Browning was the fulness of their belief in the immortality of the soul. If they did ever really doubt its truth, which was very questionable, doubt only shook the torpor of assurance from their creed; it left the assurance itself more strong and fixed, and its roots travelled deeper into their experience, and intertwined itself more vitally around it as their life matured to its close. The lecturer then illustrated from Browning's poems the strength of his faith. Both he and Tennyson laid stress on the truth of the progress of the individual life after death, from stage to stage of life, approaching more and more nearly to God. Without such progressive life they deeply felt that the present lost its vital meaning. In this they revealed their affinity to the times in which they lived, for at the heart of the thought, nay, of the very disposition of the mind of their age, and ours, was the conception that the natural world and the natural life of man signified much more than that which first met the eye. Ever since the days of Lessing and Kant, mankind had been travelling away from the narrow finitude and hard-lined limitedness of the days of Hume. Philosophers and poets alike, almost all the greatest of them, Fichte and Schelling, Hegel and Goethe, Carlyle and Wordsworth, Shelley, Tennyson and Browning, had all steeped the present life in the life to come. Thought and sense, spirit and nature interpenetrated, time is saturated with eternity, the universe is spirit-woven, God is immanent in it, and every common object is in its way "filled full of magical music, as they freight a star with light." There had been no age of the world's history when doubt had been more deep and stern. The lines of science were never drawn more stringently, binding together in an ever closer phalanx the ranks of necessity and limiting ever more remorselessly the charter of an irresponsible imagination. But the doubt itself contained the promise and was even the reflex of a larger faith—faith in an order whose sweep was wider and its spiritual significance indefinitely deeper. This "faith" reels not in the storm of warring words,

She brightens at the clash of "Yes" and "No,"
She sees the Best that glimmers through the Worst,
She feels the sun is hid but for a night,
She spies the summer through the winter's bud,
She tastes the fruit before the blossom falls,
Hears the lark within the songless egg,
She finds the fountain, where they wail'd mirage.

What he desired to ask, said the lecturer, was whether they had any right to such a triumphant conviction. What gave it to their poets? On what grounds did they hold it? What was the validity of those grounds? The answer given, both by Tennyson and Browning, was that those grounds were not intellectual.

Thou canst not prove the Nameless, O my son,
Nor canst thou prove the world thou movest in.
* * * * *
Thou canst not prove thou art immortal—no,
Nor yet that thou art mortal . . . .
For nothing worthy proving can be proven,
Nor yet disproven; wherefore thou be wise.
Cleave ever to the sunnier side of doubt,
And cling to Faith beyond the forms of Faith!

And so Tennyson declared;—

We have but faith; we cannot know,
For knowledge is of things we see.

But what must they say to that main contention of their poets? The solution of the great question by an Agnostic faith was much too easy to be right. It healed the wounds of the soul too slightly; they bled afresh, when touched by doubt. They had neither the right nor the power to be satisfied with a faith that was divorced from reason. They were entitled to take stronger ground, and the two poets, in spite of all they said about knowledge, took stronger grounds. So far from ousting reason from that great quest of Immortality, they had employed it as their guide; and reason, so far from failing them in their hour of need, was just that which had gained for them those splendid convictions which they attributed to faith. Theirs was the "faith of reason." Reason selected the elements it contained, and compacted them into a consistent and self-sustained whole. Their doubt of reason and despair of knowledge arose, he believed, from confusion as to their nature, and to that confusion they must attribute much of that acknowledged and unacknowledged Agnosticism of this and other times, which was the insecure refuge of intellectual despair.

Professor Jones then proceeded to a forcible demonstration of the distinction between logic and reason, showing how the whole of our experience of life is built up by reason, and that our knowledge of the spiritual facts of life rested on exactly the same ground as our knowledge of natural law. In each case there was hypothesis tested by experience, wrought into the general structure of our thought. When it was said that convictions were deeply felt, their strength lay not in the feeling, but in the fact that they had been made one with our rational life by a thousand judgments and practical experience. The feeling of their vital truth was the result of a satisfied intelligence, and the intelligence was satisfied only when experience was a congruous whole. Thus we were brought by the same method of reason to a conviction of the uniformity of Nature, as in the laws of motion, and of the universal presence of God. So it was that the two poets came to their deep convictions. It was not the intensity of their feeling which gave cogency to their convictions, but the broad grounds on which they rested.

This world's no blot for us
Nor blank: it means intensely and means good.
O world, as God has made it! All is beauty:
And knowing this is love, and love is duty,
What further may be sought for, or declared?

Who told Browning that? His heart? Yea, verily, but his heart made wise by much reflection; the theoretical and practical reason which built his life. Such was the poet's "faith of reason"; analogous in detail, identical in method, with that which works in the construction of the sciences and even in that knowledge of common things which lies at the basis and guides the whole of our practical outward life. In judging of Nature they remembered that man must not be left out. Nature implied man, and man in virtue of his spiritual qualities, especially of his love, implied God, and God, who was most of all God in His love, brought with Him all that man could need, and amongst these "Immortality, or something better, if better there can be." Such in the last resort was the argument of the two poets for the great hypothesis, which, like all science, must remain hypothesis to the end of time, but an hypothesis "surer than any particular fact, for it supplies the meaning of every fact.''

That which the poets called "faith," said Professor Jones, he should call knowledge; and he concluded as follows:—If I have not misunderstood the most daring and, on the whole, the most successful of all the schemes which modern thought has employed to bring some order into this strange world, and the still stranger life of men, it rests upon the same hypothesis, and brings the same message to mankind. It is the hypothesis of God, in whom all perfection, all power, all knowledge, all love dwells. Harbouring no error that it can detect, fostering no hope however fair that merely flatters, fearing no failure or contradiction, or sorrow, or sin that darkens human life, but confronting them all with open brow; nay, recognising that on every hand and in every detail of the simplest fact there are meanings that it cannot fathom, it still finds its hypothesis work. That which the idea of cause is to the common mind, or of the order of nature to the man of science—a principle he must hold true or cease to think—and whence he is always proving, though no proof is final, such is the conception of God to the Idealist. He finds it implicit in all his knowledge, the final premiss of all his life. To this conception he returns from all his wanderings, indeed, it has followed him all the way, for it is the very life of all his thinking.

It is a hypothesis, it is true; but it is a hypothesis that works: works how much better than any other, be it chance or fate, matter or blind necessity. What order is there in the life of man, or in the world, which is not of its bringing? What achievement, whether in knowledge or in virtue, which it has not inspired and guided? What advance in either can there be which is not a progressive proof that it is valid? And what better fate can we desire for man, who "learns through evil that good is best," than this, of finding ever more fully as the ages move that he lives in God,

> That God, which ever lives and loves,
> One God, one law, one element,
> And one far-off divine event,
> To which the whole creation moves.

He has the right of reason to this faith, and this faith brings with it "if not Immortality, then something better, if better there can be."

WE congratulate Mr. L. B. Booth, of Christ's College, Cambridge, on his success as fifth wrangler in the Mathematical tripos, the result of which was published this week. In the same list we are glad to see the names of Miss E. R. Lee, daughter of Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, and Miss Hilda Leigh, daughter of Mr. G. H. Leigh, both of Newnham College. Mr. Booth has succeeded Mr. Stratton as hon. secretary of the Cambridge services.

HUMAN help in our need, human forgiveness of our wrongdoing, human love in our loneliness; these are the sacraments through which, at their sweetest and purest, we feel a divine help and forgiveness and love flowing into our souls. —G. S. Merriam.

THE ASSOCIATION SERMON.

THE GOSPEL OF THE LOVE OF GOD.

BY THE REV. J. COLLINS ODGERS, B.A.

"For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."—Romans viii., 38, 39.

How strange to think that he who spoke these glowing words, so full of strong conviction, so expressive of the deepest conscious experience of God's love to man, should have been among the greatest sufferers that the world has ever known! This is the saying of no mystic dreamer in some calm and safe retreat, opening his soul to gentle influences wafted from the depths of the infinite; this is the teaching of no quiet philosopher of the Stoa or Academy, enunciating theses for the acceptance of his group of scholars. This is the rapturous assertion of a persecuted apostle, an unwearying traveller, an ardent missionary to the Gentiles, an effective organiser of the most varied and most difficult elements, an unflinching preacher of new and unwelcome truths, one who was continually exposed to hardship and suffering of every kind. What, indeed, had he not borne for the sake of the Gospel which he proclaimed? We read of the cruelties he experienced at the hands of the Jews; of the stripes, the stonings, and the frequent imprisonments; the shipwreck, the trial, and tradition preserves the story of his martyr's death. As he himself tells us, he was in "journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by his own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, the wilderness, and the sea, in perils among false brethren, in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." Surely it is out of his own experience of privation and cruelty that he says: "We must through much tribulation enter into the Kingdom of God." And yet it is the same apostle who can write to his new converts at Corinth and Philippi: "I am filled with comfort, I am exceedingly joyful in all our tribulation"; "Rejoice in the Lord alway, and again I say, Rejoice." And that which filled him with a joy so sacred and triumphant was his deep persuasion that all the experiences through which he had passed gave their combined support to the assurance that God's love was manifested in all, in things visible and invisible, in joy and in sorrow, in the light and darkness which chequered his path, and especially in the gift of His beloved Son. From the grasp of that love he was persuaded he could not fall; from its close embrace he could not be torn away; from its felt presence he could not be estranged. Not even his own sins and errors could for long expel him from his home with God. What were earthly sorrows and bodily privations compared with that deep assurance, breathed into his inmost spirit, of the Eternal Love which held him fast and would not let him go? Have we not here one more example of a widely acknowledged truth? It is the persecuted spirit which feels most deeply the value of the faith for which it will endure any sacrifice, and any pain. It is he who suffers most who is most truly conscious of the Heavenly Father's love. It is he who has fought the good fight, and is ready to be offered, who looks forward with joy and hope unspeakable to "the appearing of the Lord, the righteous Judge of all!"

As we read this magnificent testimony of Paul, we have to confess that it is not easy to realise with precision in this present age some of the glowing thoughts which find expression in his words. I presume that he held the current opinion of his day that the Throne of the Supreme was surrounded by innumerable hosts of angels, to whom He gave His mandates. Principalities and powers were there, rank beyond rank, legion beyond legion; whilst realm beyond realm, sphere beyond sphere, was filled with adoring throngs of radiant forms, hierarchies and angels according to their several orders, such as Dante describes in his "Paradiso," with a richness of imagination unsurpassed, and those of whom our own Milton speaks:—

> The helmed Cherubim
> And sworded Seraphim
> Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed.

Even these bright beings, on whom the Father's glory directly shone, who stood around His throne, ready and waiting to do His will, even these, so the Apostle may have thought, could not monopolise His favour, nor absorb all His love. And though beyond the regions filled with the blessed forms of light and joy, there were spheres through which the fallen angels were allowed to roam, neither there could the shadows of evil screen off humanity from the beneficence and pity of the King of Kings. Beyond the flat earth and the crystal dome of the firmament were heights and depths which none could gauge, and even in those unknown vastnesses the love of God was not swallowed up nor lost. Nor could any created thing, no new erection on earth, or in the skies, no fresh system of stars or constellations, no sudden catastrophe which might close the history of the universe, no unexpected upheaval of our co-ordinated and fixed experiences, sunder us from His affection. Nor could death; for "when we are absent from the body we are present with the Lord"; nor could life, with all the specious snares and seductive influences of sunny hours when pleasure so often makes us forget our duty to the highest Good. Neither present sorrows nor our forebodings as to the future; neither that which we know, nor that about which we can but dimly conjecture; neither that with regard to which we must exercise patience now, nor that in which we must simply trust for the time that is to come—none of these things, says the Apostle, can thrust us beyond the reach of the eternal love of God.

Many centuries have rolled away since these words were written, and we look out upon another world, and upon very different conditions of society. We cannot, indeed, speak of the ranks and orders of the angelic host as confidently as did Paul; we can only surmise that those spirits that are called away from their earthly home, do not pass an idle eternity of happiness, but find their greatest joy in the task of helping others to rise to higher aims and nobler thoughts than had been possible for them before. For us the heights and depths in which our planet is immersed are vastly extended. We know now that we gaze through the darkness of the night, not upon little fairy lamps hung up beneath the solid dome of the firmament, but upon myriads of glittering worlds. Our minds cannot contain all these vastnesses; they are too great, too majestic for us; and our spirits might fail and pine away in the wilderness of space, did we not believe with the apostle that nothing can separate us from the love of God. We may be but as the small dust of the balance, but we are the children of a Father who will never loose us from His grasp, and even in the infinite and illimitable we find our home with Him. Abysses as wide as the universe, whole cycles of ages in the great long ago, these are annihilated by the contact of the Eternal Spirit with our spirits, for God fills all space and all time. Neither height nor depth can sunder us from Him. Nor can death, though death is as formidable now as in the apostolic age, removing some from our little household of faith whom we can so sorely spare, not only the accomplished leader and profound thinker* who one hundred years ago was given to the world, but within the last six months the bold preacher and resolute social reformer, whose departure we in the North have had so much cause to mourn, the eager and courageous exponent of our views, of whom, all too suddenly, the South was bereft, and the sweet singer and divine, dwelling on the other side of the Atlantic, whose plaintive words, as his own requiem, we have sung this morning; even death cannot wipe out our consciousness of God's love displayed in them, cannot rob us of our rich inheritance of sweetest memories. And although these are gone from us, life is still with us, full of golden opportunities and of noblest tasks; and if these are consecrated to the service of the Lord of all, they too will speak to us of the love divine. Here are things present, duties, trials, self-sacrifices, sorrows, which press upon us now, forebodings it may be, as to things which are to come; and yet, have not all the centuries which have intervened since the days of Paul taught us, by the very advance of humanity, by the progress of knowledge, by the wider growth of Christian charity, that God's love is more and more displayed around us and within us, that now it is manifested in the manifold blessings we enjoy, in the sunshine which illumines our lives, and in the purest affections of our hearts to-day?

But for the apostle it was not any of the ordinary experiences of life, whether joyful or sorrowful, which were so expressive of God's love for His earthly children as the revelation of His mercy in the person and the Cross of Christ. And when Paul speaks of Christ he concentrates his attention not on the figure of the lowly teacher who wandered on the shores of Galilee, and spake his homely parables to the people on the mountain slope, but rather on one, who, having passed through the death on the cross, was made known as an immortal spirit, and as spirit, sundered from the flesh, came near to the very hearts, not of the apostles only, but of the whole community of Christian believers. To Paul the love of God was revealed in nothing so clearly, so abundantly, as in that cruel death on Calvary, from which we are so apt to turn away with averted eyes and trembling lips. How was God's love displayed in that scene of shame and suffering? Again I have to say that it is no easy task to determine with exactness what is the meaning which lies behind the expressions which he uses with reference to the sacrifice on the cross; it is not easy to say how far he re-interprets with spiritual significance Jewish terms and symbols with which from boyhood he was entirely familiar. And yet it seems clear, that in his view, that death on the cross was much more than a martyrdom for the cause of truth; it was the divinely appointed means for the reformation of the world; it was the wondrous spectacle which should touch and thrill the hearts of all, bring to a focus all wavering affection, constrain every will which was at enmity with God, and reconsecrate all lives to a divine and holy service. For the death upon the cross was a manifestation, good for all time, of the hidden possibilities of the human soul, a revelation of the victory of faith, of the deep harmony which may exist between the will of man and the behests of God. The supreme archetype of humanity suffered, not in our stead, but in our behalf, that we might see how divine succour is granted in our sorest needs, and the peace of God be the all sufficient reward for faithfulness. The light of the glory of God shone forth in the face of Jesus Christ, not indeed as an exhibition of Incarnate Deity, but as a proof of the ability of the saintly soul to reflect the image of its Maker. God's love to man was manifested in that cruel death upon the cross; first, because the Father did not shun the pain of permitting His own dear Son to suffer that so there might be given to the world an all sufficient presentation of the majesty of faithfulness even unto death; and, secondly, because that love in the heart of Christ, that spirit of forgiveness, that intense and yearning pity even for those who gave him pain—these were a revelation such as nowhere else could have been given, of the love, forgiveness, mercy, and pity existing for ever in the Souls of Souls. In Christ, the image of the invisible God, the apostle saw the true reflection of the Eternal Mind. If by the suffering on Calvary the sublimest possibilities of human love were so abundantly revealed, the cross was the surest indication of that larger love, still more divine, more constraining, more intense, which holds all men and all things in its wide embrace.

Here then in this pronouncement, majestic in its simple grandeur, yet glowing with an ardour which rolls through the ages like a trumpet blast, we have the expression of Paul's triumphant faith in the love of God for His earthly children, a love which no obstacle could impede, no distance weaken, no calamity impair, a love which reached its highest manifestation in the cross of Christ. For if in that most trying hour on Calvary, suffering imparted fresh fervour and more thrilling intensity to the love which filled the heart of Christ—not only towards those who stood beside the cross until all was finished, his mother, the beloved disciple, and the little band of faithful women—but also towards the very criminal dying at his side, and all who, blinded by cruel passion, knew not what they did, have we not a revelation of the inmost heart of God, an indication of that yearning love which will not let us go, which is outpoured alike on Jew and Gentile, on saint and sinner, on those who coldly stand aloof and those who by the intensity of sorrow are brought very near to the Divine Presence. Where there is love, there must also be capacity for pain. Then, since the Beloved Son reveals what is in the Father's heart, we have in Christ the assurance that the Heavenly Father is not afar off, enthroned in glory, untouched by mortal woes, but that He feels our sorrows, is pained when we depart from Him, waits with longing patience for our return, is ever ready to receive us in our penitence, to welcome us to His embrace, and to enwrap us in the robe of His affection. If that is Paul's view, may it not be ours also? And with such an interpretation of the cross of Christ, may we not proclaim with bolder hearts and firmer confidence, the glad Gospel of the love of God to man? The Gospel of God's Love—that is our message to the world to-day, as it has been since the day on which this Association, whose cause I plead, was founded. Our forerunners lifted their voices against every doctrine that conflicted with this Gospel of Love; they gave their unwavering testimony against the favourite dogmas of the older orthodoxy, the ruin of man's nature through Adam's sin, our supposed subjection to the assaults of a personal Satan, the fear of a God whose burning wrath could be appeased by blood alone, an eternity of woe for the impenitent. But for us there remains surely a work of still larger import. It is to teach the love of God in face of all the sins and sorrows of the world, to show that this love is the source of all our hopes, the fount of all our joy, our chief guarantee for the reality of the immortal life, and to hold to it as that which can alone assure us that in spite of all that baffles the intellect, and pains our hearts to-day, righteousness and love shall win the victory at last. Do you ask how we apprehend this love of God to man? I reply that we know it through our own experience, and we accept it on the testimony of others. Are not the words of Tennyson a true record of the facts of our own consciousness, when he says:—

> If e'er when faith had fall'n asleep,
> I heard a voice "believe no more,"
> And heard an ever-breaking shore
> That tumbled in the Godless deep,
> A warmth within the breast would melt
> The freezing reason's colder part,
> And like a man in wrath the heart
> Stood up and answer'd, "I have felt."

But when our experience falters in the presence of mysteries we cannot solve, when we are troubled with doubts, and unnerved by our fears, then let us look to that figure on the cross of Calvary, human, yet divine in its complete surrender to the will of the Most High, and let us behold in that love which sorrowed unto death, in that affection more intense than ever at the hour of departure, in that faithfulness so sorely tried, in that spirit of forgiveness which no pain could quench; in these let us behold a witness, a revelation; an all sufficient assurance of the existence of love, faithfulness, forgiveness in the heart of Him who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Father of us all.

One closing word. We have come hither from many centres of work, from many difficult outposts of duty, from many spheres of labour where the ground is not so productive, nor the harvests so rich as we could wish, and it may be that sometimes our hearts fail us at the magnitude of the task which lies before us, at the perplexing problems which give us anxious hours. Oh, may our courage and our zeal be revived at the thought that we carry as our banner, the Gospel of the free unpurchased Love of God, and that if we can make that the chief burden of our witness, and show it forth in our daily lives, then it will not matter what our difficulties may be, nor how anxieties may press, for in every heart there will be the secret consciousness of a love divine which moves through all things, and the sense of a sure repose within the Everlasting Arms. It was an ever strengthening conviction of the love of God to man which has purified our theology in the past; it is the same steadfast faith which must deepen our religion in the future, and interpret for us the secrets of God's Providence. Light will chase away the darkness of despair, and joyful hope reign ever in our hearts, if, with the apostle, we too may be "persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Jesus Christ our Lord."

DR. MARTINEAU AND THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE following note appeared with the Report of the Association presented to the Annual Meeting on Wednesday afternoon:—

Newspaper paragraphs have appeared recently stating or suggesting that Dr. Martineau was "little of a Unitarian," and that in his later years "he had ceased to identify himself with the denomination." The following letter, written in reply to the congratulations of the Council and Committee of the Unitarian Association on his ninetieth birthday, will therefore be read with interest:—

35, Gordon-square, London, W.C.,
April 23, 1894.

"Dear Mr. Bowie,

"If it has been a pleasant surprise to "receive, on my recent anniversary, "words of sympathy and benediction "from many a stranger belonging to some "communion other than our own, you "give me a far more heartfelt satisfaction "when you report the congratulations "and good wishes of my fellows in an "Association to which I have belonged "from its commencement, and for which "I have been permitted more than once "to plead. That your Council and Committee so kindly and graciously remember "me and note the steps of my retreat, now "that my days of service are over, touches "me deeply, and stirs in me a gratitude "which I cannot adequately express.

"Believe me always,

"Yours affectionately,

"JAMES MARTINEAU."

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING.

THE business meeting of this Association was held on Wednesday afternoon in Essex Hall, the chair being taken by the ex-President, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, who explained that the President had just been presiding at the luncheon to representatives of District Associations and others, and would be in the chair at the evening meeting.

Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, as treasurer, presented the accounts, and announced that the collection at the morning service had amounted to £27 11s. 9d., which was less than the £33 16s. 10d. of last year. They had also £350 less income, and an increased expenditure of £1,600, and yet were still within their income. The collections on Association Sunday were £39 higher than last year, but still less than the £613 of 1902; more congregations than ever had taken part in that united effort. But, though for the present year they were still within their income, the outlook for the coming years was by no means so satisfactory. This year they lost £50 of income, which had been promised for three years, and next year they would lose a further £450, which had been promised for four years, in connection with the effort to raise an additional £2,000 to meet the subscription of £1,000 of their anonymous friend. They had also lost £252 by the death of subscribers, including one subscription of £100, and had only £10 from relatives of deceased friends to set against that. He, therefore, appealed very urgently to supporters of the Association to remember that they were perilously near losing the £1,000 subscription, and to use every effort of securing new subscriptions to maintain the present high level of their work.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, the secretary, then introduced the annual report of the Committee, of which an abstract here follows:—

THE EIGHTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT.

The report opened with the following passages:—

IN the world of religious thought and life there has been great and varied activity during the past year. Manifestoes and counter manifestoes, approving and disapproving "the Higher Criticism," have been issued by opposing sections in the Anglican Church; some of the Bishops have expressed their alarm lest there should be any tampering with even the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed, others have shown their readiness to dispense with its futher use in Christian worship; the supporters of evangelical orthodoxy have expended large sums of money and much organising skill in promoting "Revivals"; anti-religious organisations have displayed remarkable assiduity in spreading literature, apparently with the object of showing that religion might with advantage be dispensed with by mankind altogether. The legal interpretation of creeds and statements of belief has brought disaster upon the United Free Church of Scotland, and has produced not a little heart-searching and perturbation among those Nonconformists in England the Trust Deeds of whose chapels are closed to freedom and progress in theology. Again, untouched by the controversies of ecclesiastics and theologians, there are masses of the people who in their own dim, uncertain, and sometimes eagerly passionate, ways are seeking, under the name of social justice, larger, fuller, truer life—some kingdom of heaven on earth to which they may belong.

The turmoil produced by conflicting creeds and ecclesiastical policies, the condition of the unchurched masses, with the resulting perplexity and unrest, are full of suggestion and warning to those who lead and govern the Churches and the State. A serious responsibilty is cast upon those men and women, whether as individuals, or associated in churches, who believe that a reverent and devout religion may live and thrive in the world—a religion whose adherents welcome every fresh gleam of truth and light which may be revealed to the human mind and conscience. The number of people prepared to stand openly and courageously for these principles of faith and freedom is happily increasing in this and other lands, though they still form a small and straggling company when confronted by the hosts of ancient orthodoxies, and the forces of modern materialism.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association throughout its long history has steadfastly maintained that faith and freedom, science and religion, truth and criticism are friends, not foes, and its successive committees have tried to adapt and adjust the work of the Association to the varying thoughts and needs of the age. Considered in relation to present-day needs and opportunities, the work accomplished is indeed small; but considered in relation to the means placed at the disposal of the Association, and the sluggishness and lack of purpose and enthusiasm of not a few churches and individuals who make profession of a liberal faith, the record of the past year is full of interest and encouragement. That so much work has been done is largely due to the initiative of one member of the Association, whose subscription of a thousand pounds a year, beginning in 1903, set such a high standard of generous giving.

The matter of the Report was then ranged under the headings of the Sub-committees charged with the different departments of the work. They are given here with the name of the chairman of each sub-committtee added:—

Home Mission (Rev. W. G. Tarrant).—Particulars were given of grants to 76 congregations, and to several Associations for district ministers, while large amounts had been expended on special lectures, services for the people, the Cambridge services and special preachers, the whole expenditure for work under this general heading being £3,449 15s. 2d. Of the four district ministers, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards had worked for the London and South Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly for twelve years; the Rev. R. P. Farley for the Liverpool District Association for two years, while the year had seen two fresh appointments, the Rev. John Ellis to the Yorkshire Union, and the Rev. Rudolf Davis to the Western Union. The plan of linking two congregations under the charge of one minister had been followed at Canterbury and Deal, Devonport and Plymouth, Loughborough and Ilkeston, and Christ Church, Nottingham and Newark. The courses of lectures by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," and the Rev. J. E. Carpenter on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," attracted large and deeply interested audiences, the former at Northampton and Nottingham, the latter at Hampstead, Plumstead and Bournemouth, and again after Christmas at Hull and Norwich. Further courses are to be arranged for next autumn and spring. The great success of theatre services at Oldham and Stratford (London) was noted, and the marked interest shown by the students attending the Cambridge services.

Publications (Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee.).—Nearly 25,000 books and upwards of 150,000 tracts were printed and published during 1904. These included the sixpenny edition of Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," and Mr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels," to which have been added Newman's "Soul," with Professor Upton's Introduction, and Dr. M. J. Savage's "The Passing and Permanent in Religion." Professor Wendt's Essex Hall Lecture, on "The Idea and Reality of Revelation," together with his Oxford lecture on "Typical Forms of Christianity," was published in a little volume, also a new edition of the Rev. A. Webster's "My Pilgrimage from Calvinism to Unitarianism," and a series of "Home Pages," edited by Miss Helen Brooke Herford. A third edition of the Revised Essex Hall Hymnal brought the number printed up to 15,000. Other recent publications were the volume of Dr. Brooke Herford's sermons "Anchors of the Soul," with a biographical sketch by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Dr. Herford's "Eutychus" papers, the Rev. Walter Lloyd's "Reist's Apology," and, most recently of all, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's "James Martineau, Theologian and Teacher," the new enlarged edition of the Rev. H. S. Solly's "Know Thyself," and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Agnosticism and Theism." An edition of Dr. Crooker's "Supremacy of Jesus" and of Dr. Savage's "Pillars of the Temple" had been purchased from the American Association, and also the remainder of the two volume edition of the "Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau" by Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton, now sold for 12s. 6d.

Scottish (Mr. C. F. Pearson).—Particulars were given of the work done in the administration of the McQuaker Trust, by grants to congregations, special lectures and services, &c., the most notable event being the acquisition of the site for the new Church in Aberdeen, for the building of which the Trustees had promised the last £250, of the £1,000 still required. The old building and site had been sold for £2,000.

Foreign Mission (Rev. James Harwood).—The gratifying results of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's Mission to Australasia were noted, and the conviction expressed that the time was ripe for the appointment of a minister at Wellington. £50 a year had been granted to Mr. F. Sinclaire, M.A., of Auckland, a student for the ministry at Manchester College, Oxford, and continued support had been given to the Hungarian and Indian student at the same college. Mr. Yoshimoto, the Japanese student, had unfortunately been obliged, by the state of his health, to return home. Miss Emily Sharpe had handed over to Trustees appointed by the Association £2,000, to provide a scholarship for a Hungarian student at Channing House School for Girls. A hopeful report had been received from the Rev. H. Haugerud, of the new church at Kristiania, and also of Mission work done in India in connection with the Brahmo Samaj, by Mr. H. C. Sarkar and Mr. V. R. Shinde. Several tracts had been published in Urdu for the use of Mohammedans in India, and there had been other publications in European languages. There was much testimony to the warm appreciation of Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul" among Indian students. The new arrangements in regard to the work among the Unitarians of the Khasi Hills were noted, and particulars given as to the coming meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Geneva in August.

Deceased Members.—The report contained the memorial resolution of the committee on the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and paid a tribute to the memory of Mrs. W. Jenkin Davies, Mr. Charles Harding, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, Mr. Alfred Paget, Mr. J. P. Thomasson, and Mrs. Cooke, of Guildford. There had been many other losses by death, and special mention was made of the Rev. J. W. Chadwick of Brooklyn, and the Maharshi Debendra Nath Tagore of Calcutta, the patriarch of the Brahmo Samaj.

Finance (Mr. H. B. Lawford).—The report made in conclusion the following statement and appeal:—

The Treasurer's statement of accounts for the year ending December 31, 1904, shows that the income for the year was £8,211 13s. 8d., made up as follows:—Subscriptions, £4,694 10s. 6d.; donations, £29 14s.; collections, £594 0s. 4d.; dividends and interest, £1,172 11s. 7d.; book department, £1,657 16s. 5d.; special income, £63 0s. 10d. The expenditure for the year amounted to £8,203 14s. 2d., made up as follows:—Missionary grants for home work, £3,449 15s. 2d.; foreign work, £1,228 16s. 2d.; grants of books and tracts, home, £412 6s. 4d.; foreign, £318 2s. 5d.; deputation expenses, £42 8s. 6d.; book department, £1,548 18s. 2d.; salaries and wages—office and book room, £915 4s. 4d.; maintenance and office expenses, £216 6s. 7d.; printing and postage of annual report and anniversary expenses, £71 16s. 6d. It will be seen, therefore, that the whole income was expended during the year, less £7 19s. 6d.

The subscription list for 1904 shows only the very slight decrease of £8 14s. on 1903. Greater difficulties confront the treasurer during the present year, for there have been heavy losses by death recently, which will largely reduce the list for 1905, unless new subscribers come forward to take their place. Thirty-four new subscribers have joined the Association during the early part of 1905, several of whom were induced to do so by the Chairman of the Finance Committee personally speaking to members of the congregation at Wandsworth, to which he belongs—an example which might well be copied by many others.

During 1904 227 congregations had collections, and the amount received from this source was £560 3s. 6d., an increase of nine congregations and of £38 10s. 3d. on the previous year.

Legacies were received during 1904 as follows:—Mrs. John Cooke, of Guildford, £495; Mr. T. Gregory Foster, of London, £90; Mr. David Rees, of the Rhondda Valley, £10. The family of the late Mrs. Alfred Lawrence gave an "In Memoriam" gift of £250. In the early part of the present year a legacy of £500 was received from the executors of Mrs. W. Jenkin Davies, a former member of the Committee; also £100 from Miss Rea, of Belfast.

The Committee would again impress upon the members of the Association that the continuance of the subscription of £1,000 a year is dependent upon the income from subscriptions being kept up to the level of 1903. There are many Unitarians whose names do not yet appear in the list of subscribers. No one who makes himself acquainted with the activities of the Association can fail to perceive that it is doing large, important, and varied work at home and abroad in promoting the principles of Unitarian Christianity.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, referred to some of the points of chief interest. He spoke with much feeling of the loss they had sustained in the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and expressed his great pleasure in the publication of the volume of his lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century." At the time of Mr. Armstrongs death, the Committee had passed the following resolution, which was embodied in the report, and which he read:—

> That this Committee has heard with profound grief of the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, a Past-President of the Association, and for many years a wise and faithful ally in its work at home and abroad. To the invaluable services rendered by him as minister, counsellor, and leader, he added specially those of a writer and lecturer, unsurpassed among us for clear, scholarly, and convincing argument on behalf of the principles for which the Association stands. In the hour of our sorrow we are thankful that, though death has deprived us of the living voice that appealed so strongly to our minds and hearts, he has left an imperishable legacy, not only in his writings, but also in the memory of his unselfish and untiring devotion to human needs, his unswerving fidelity to conscience, and his constant trust in the living God. Desiring thus to place on record our deep sense of the worth of our beloved colleague, we would also respectfully tender to his widow and family our sincere sympathy in their bereavement.

He also referred to the meetings of the International Council to be held at Geneva in the last days of August, and, on the strength of his own experience at Amsterdam two years ago, strongly urged all who were able to do so to attend the meetings. He noted with satisfaction the prospect of the new church building at Aberdeen, where, on his visit to Scotland as President, he had been impressed by the signs of vigorous life he found:

The Rev. F. B. MOTT, of Southport, who seconded, said that the report was of the greatest interest, because at every point where they were reaching out to do anything they saw the great field that was waiting for their efforts and demanding of them a larger measure of work. He felt sure that it only needed to put the work before their congregations to secure an adequate response. He had proved it at Southport, where the simple statement that he made of the work being done and what it meant had led to contributions which raised their congregation from being forty-eighth on the Association Sunday list until there were only twelve others above them. If they could do that at Southport, it could be done all over the country. What they needed, he said in conclusion, was the passion, the enthusiasm, the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, which belonged to that Whit-week, which would kindle them to a greater self-sacrifice than they had ever known.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU proposed a vote of thanks to the President, the Right Hon. William Kenrick, for his services during the past year, and the election of Mr. C. F. Pearson as the new president. Mr. Kenrick had not been able to attend their meetings as often as they would have liked, but had always been a great help when he had been present. Years ago he remembered that the Association was honoured by the presidency of his uncle Mr. Timothy Kenrick, and he was glad that day to have made the acquaintance of the President's son, and he felt that they might hope in coming years to have another president bearing that honoured name. With his friend, Mr. Pearson, he had worked for years in many ways, and he was confident that in him they were securing a good president.

The Rev. ALFRED HALL seconded, and, having spoken of the genial kindness of their President-elect, and his wide knowledge of their work and their ministers, expressed the hope that during his year of office he would see the completion of two great funds, that of the Home Missionary College in Manchester, and that of the Martineau Memorial at Norwich.

The resolution was very heartily carried, and Mr. PEARSON briefly acknowledged the honour they had done him in electing him to that office.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the next resolution, referred to the portrait of Dr. Martineau, which they had just acquired and hung in that hall. Of the cost, £315, they had already received from subscribers £297 10s. There would be some other expenses in putting the picture up. As treasurer of the fund he expressed the hope that friends would supply the remainder of what they needed during that week.

The resolution was :—

That the cordial thanks of this Meeting be given to the Officers and the Committee for their services during the past year, and that the following be the respective appointments for the present year :—

Treasurer—Mr. Oswald Nettlefold. Trustees—Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P. Auditors—Mr. Harold Wade, Mr. Benson Lawford, Mr. W. Fitchett Wurtzburg. Council—(See List in Annual Report.) Committee—Mr. G. W. Brown, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Miss Helen Brooke Herford, Mr. Herbert B. Lawford, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, Rev. F. W. Stanley, Miss Tagart, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler.

Mr. F. J. M. STRATTON, of Cambridge, seconded this, and in doing so said how grateful they had been for the kindly and generous support of their services at Cambridge, and especially to Mr. Bowie for his constant help and advice. He asked ministers to let them know when any members of their congregations came up to Cambridge, that their interest in the services might be enlisted. He had been succeeded in the secretaryship of the services by Mr. L. B. Booth, of Christ's College, who had just come out as fifth Wrangler in the Mathematical Tripos.

The Chairman moved :—

That the hearty welcome of this Meeting be given to the Representatives of the following District Societies :—East Cheshire Union—Rev. H. S. Tayler, M.A.; Eastern Union—Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A.; Irish Non-Subscribing Association—Rev. G. H. Vance, B.D.; Liverpool District Association—Rev. R. P. Farley, B.A.; London District Society—Mr. Hahnemann Epps; London and S.E.C. Prov. Assembly—Mr. W. Wallace Bruce; Manchester District Association—Rev. James Ruddle; Midland Christian Union—Mr. W. Byng Kenrick; North and East Lancashire Mission—Rev. J. J. Wright; North Lancashire and Westmoreland—Rev. H. V. Mills; North Midland Association—Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas; Northumberland and Durham Association—Rev. W. H. Lambelle; South Cheshire District—Rev. James C. Street; South Wales Unitarian Association—Rev. David Rees; South-East Wales Society—Rev. W. J. Phillips; Southern Unitarian Association—Rev. C. C. Coe, F.R.G.S.; Western Union—Rev. John McDowell; Yorkshire Unitarian Union—Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A.

The Rev. L. JENKINS JONES, Mayor of Woolwich, seconded the resolution, and said they had great satisfaction for several reasons in passing such a resolution. First, because they knew the work their friends were doing, and its difficulties; they knew their courage and fidelity; and because of the future and the consecration they knew they would bring to the work. They were unanimous in that expression of sympathy.

The Rev. HUGON S. TAYLER acknowledged the resolution, and spoke of the great debt they in East Cheshire had owed for many years to the Association for the help extended to their work. Their experience of the Association had been uniformly happy. When members of their congregations, as often happened, went away to live elsewhere, and went where there was no Unitarian congregation, they would do well to send their contributions to that Association, and then they might feel that they were helping in the common work. When they saw the growing liberalism of the country, some of them were inclined to fold their arms and wait to see what would come. But many others, seeing what was being done in the field of Biblical criticism and the general trend of thought, felt that that was no time to give up their religious work, but that it must be all the more strenuously maintained, and therefore they did well to support that Association, and the local Associations.

The Rev. W. J. PHILLIPS responded on behalf of Wales, where, he said, they were greatly dependent on the Association for the continuance of their work. He spoke with satisfaction of the new success which had come to their efforts at Bridgend under Mr. David Rees's ministry, and the prospect at Pontypridd of a church building, where two cottages had been bought, and a site thus secured. When the appeal for the church building came before them he commended it to their generous support. At Newport, where they had once tried and failed, there was now better hope of the establishment of services. The revival in Wales had not left them untouched. It had led to searchings of heart among them also, and there had been a deepening and revival of work in many of their congregations. They were not satisfied with the past and looked forward to better things in the future.

The CHAIRMAN moved :

That this Meeting extends its warmest welcome to the representatives of Unitarian and other Liberal religious movements in other lands; and conveys an expression of its esteem and goodwill to all who are endeavouring to unite pure religion and perfect liberty.

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Foreign Correspondents of the Association in America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Cape Colony, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Iceland, India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Norway and Sweden, and Switzerland.

The Rev. J. C. STREET in seconding, said that they who passed that resolution represented a group of workers for freedom and righteousness and catholicity gathered from all parts of the kingdom, a body of worshippers and workers standing for the same things everywhere, though a small body, struggling to promote absolute freedom, a fearless inquiry for the truth, a search after the infinite will of God. They had their peculiar trials and difficulties, and there was an extraordinary amount of hostility around them; yet they came up and looked into each other's eyes, and could thank God and take courage as they went back each to his own field of service. And they were welcoming in that resolution workers for righteousness and freedom in all parts of the world, some who perhaps found even greater difficulties than their own. They were fighting the same battle, standing where they themselves stood, and aiming for the same high ends. The welcome came from their hearts, and he was sure it would go to the hearts of their friends.

Before the resolution was put and carried, the Secretary presented a number of letters of greeting and regret for absence, which had been received, and read some passages from them. A record of these will be found elsewhere in our present issue.

The Rev. F. L. PHALEN, of Worcester, Mass., was the first to respond, and presented the cordial greetings of the American Unitarian Association. He could not feel that he was greeted as a foreigner, for he seemed to be quite at home, and he recalled the memory of a previous visit, when he was in London for the meeting of the National Conference. He paid a tribute to the memory of Dr. Martineau, that leader and saint of their common body, and of Dr. Brooke Herford, who had ordained him to the ministry in America. He concluded with a reference to the great monument erected at Plymouth, Mass., to the Pilgrim Fathers, one of the finest statues he had ever seen. He urged any of them who went to America to go to Plymouth to see that memorial. Round the base were four small statues, representing law, education, morality, and history, and towering over these an heroic female figure of Faith. That was what they wanted on both sides of the ocean, faith in the great things of life, faith in one another and in their future, and faith in God over all.

Mr. ALFRED J. TAYLOR, of Hobart, Tasmania, also responded, and spoke in grateful memory of Mr. Armstrong, whose sermons they had often used in their services at Hobart. They had no minister, but for eight years he and Mr. Lovell had conducted the services. They had been delighted to receive Mr. Hargrove's visit. He spoke further of the liberal influences at work in their midst, and his conception of religion, looking with good hope to the future.

The Rev. HERMAN HAUGERUD, of Christiania, in responding, said that it was just a year ago last Monday that Mr. Armstrong came to them at Christiania, bringing the greetings of that Association. By the fervour of his preaching, by his sympathy and appreciation of all the good things of their land, he had won the respect of all. He was one of God's noblemen, and they were grieved when the sad news of his departure came. His presence had been a great help to them, and gave them new strength and zeal to go forward in the fight for the principles of liberal religion. He gave them the sense of a larger fellowship, and told them they had many warm friends in England. They rejoiced, in their isolation, to feel that they had the support and sympathy of the Unitarian congregations of England, that they were one with them in the spirit of Christ, "one in the freedom of the truth, in the joy of paths untrod, one in the soul's perennial youth, one in the larger thought of God." They were confident that there was a great future for liberal religion in Scandinavia, and they were very grateful for the financial and moral support they had received in their efforts.

The time for speeches had now elapsed, and the following resolutions were unanimously passed by the meeting without discussion.

Moved from the chair and seconded by the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS :—

"Open Trust Deeds."

That in view of the disaster which has overtaken the United Free Church of Scotland, and the legal and moral difficulties which from time to time confront all creed-bound churches, this meeting of Unitarians is of opinion that the only way to safeguard the truths of the Christian religion is steadfastly to adhere to the principle involved in the "Open Trust Deed," in which it is clearly laid down that if any question should arise as to the purposes for which the building or the income from property may lawfully be used, the widest meaning shall be attached to the Trust, so that neither by reference to the actual or supposed opinions of the founders, nor otherwise, shall any restriction be imposed on the liberty of the congregation for the time being to change its opinions with regard to religious doctrines or modes of regulating worship.

Moved from the chair, and seconded by the Rev. J. E. MANNING:

"The Higher Criticism."

That this meeting of Unitarians expresses its gratitude to the great scholars of this and other lands, who by their critical studies and patient research have succeeded in making the books of the Old and New Testament more intelligible, interesting, and inspiring to the present generation; and, believing that religion is best served by the frank and fearless pursuit of truth, gladly welcomes the ascertained results of what is known as the Higher Criticism of the Bible.

Moved by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, and seconded by Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON :—

"International Peace."

That in common with all Christian men and women we rejoice in every step made towards the establishment of international goodwill, and the avoidance of war in cases of dispute, by recourse to regularly constituted international tribunals; but, realising the immense forces of ignorance, prejudice, and self-interest that obstruct the path of progress we earnestly commend anew the sacred cause of Peace and Arbitration to the steadfast and intelligent support of our ministers and congregations throughout the country; and in particular send a very cordial greeting to the World's Peace Congress to be held at Lucerne in September next.

The CHAIRMAN, in conclusion, moved, and the Rev. J. J. WRIGHT seconded a vote of thanks to the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, preacher of the Anniversary Sermon, and to the Little Portland-street congregation and many friends in London for their hospitality.

The Rev. J. C. ODGERS, in acknowledging the vote, recalled the fact that forty-nine years ago his father had preached the Annual Sermon, and eighteen years ago his elder brother, while four years ago another brother had been President. He was always glad to do whatever he could for that Association.

The meeting then adjourned for tea, and in the evening a public meeting was held, at which the President took the chair, and a number of valuable speeches were made. The report of these and the remaining proceedings of the week we must reserve for future publication.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

AT the annual meeting of the Association, the Secretary presented a large number of letters from friends and fellow-workers in other countries, sending greeting and good wishes, and expressions of regret that they were not able to come over to take part in the meetings. We give here some extracts from the letters.

Bishop Ferencz.

Bishop Ferencz wrote from Kolozsvár on behalf of the Unitarian Churches of Hungary, saying that the past year had been difficult for their agricultual population, because of the bad harvest, but that there were signs of progress. They had carried out the re-organisation of their church government, and improved the ministers' stipend fund, and that the number of their theological students was doubled, so that he hoped soon to be able to supply all vacant places. The Francis David Association had carried on excellent work. He had been present at the Budapest meeting in May, when the Rev. N. Jozan read an appreciative paper on Dr. Martineau. The building of the churches at Hodmezovasarhely and Gzekelyudvarhely was proceeding. They had translated three of our tracts and some of the papers read at the Amsterdam Conference into Hungarian, and looked forward with great interest to the coming meetings of the International Council at Geneva, where many of them hoped to attend. "I pray for God's blessing on your annual meetings," the Bishop concluded, "and I commend our Church to your further goodness and brotherly love."

Professor G. Boros.

"My thoughts have for some time past been lingering round the memory of Dr. Martineau, whom we regard as one of the greatest of saints and thinkers. We Hungarian Unitarians and other liberal thinkers celebrated the centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth in May at Budapest, and shall do so again at Kolozsvár at the end of the College year. Dr. Martineau's "Five Points of Christian Faith" is being distributed in our own tongue. We are in constant touch with the thinking public through our magazines, and the lectures given by the Francis David Association at Budapest, Kolozsvár, and other places, and are just beginning to correspond with Unitarians who are scattered about the country where there are no Unitarian centres. Though last year was a very bad one for our people, yet they are still zealous, and take an interest in religious matters. But the political struggle in our country ties our hands, and, until a change is brought about, progress of any kind is checked. I wish to congratulate the British and Foreign Unitarian Association upon its eighty years of wide and useful activity, and all the Unitarians of Hungary unite with me in wishing the Association a long and prosperous life."

Baron de Schickler.

Baron F. de Schickler, the President of the Délégation Libérale des Eglises Reformées de France, wrote from Paris :—

"You did us the honour of sending to our Triennial General Assembly of 1904 two delegates, who brought us your greetings and good wishes, with a brotherly cordiality that touched us greatly. Allow me, first of all, to thank you not only in the name of my colleagues of the Delegation, but also on behalf of the representatives of our Liberal Churches, who were present at that Assembly, and to whom the address of Mr. Pritchard proved so interesting and inspiring. We should have liked to have shown our gratitude by sending a representative in our turn to your anniversary meetings, but our professors and pastors are kept here by their duties to their colleges and respective parishes; and the religious situation through which we are passing is so very grave that it scarcely permits any of the others to leave Paris even for a moment. You are aware that the Bill for the Separation of the Church and State is actually before Parliament. All our efforts are devoted to the end that it may be conceived, as far as possible, in a real spirit of liberty. To attain this there is a great deal to be fought for, and the future condition of our churches, of our theological colleges, of our pastors and their work, causes us very serious anxiety. We are a small minority in the midst of a great mass of Catholics, or rather of those who are the enemies of all sects; and we Liberals are a minority also, so far as numbers and resources, in the French Protestant Church. Several of our churches are composed of poor peasants accustomed to rely on regular allowances from the State, and who are quite unable to support their churches unaided. We find ourselves in the midst of sacrifices which would be greater than our powers could endure, if the goodness of God did not sustain us. It is on Him that we rely, since He has never abandoned His little flock. Help us, by your sympathy and your prayers, and be assured of our most ardent wishes that you may continue, under the blessing of our Heavenly Father, the work of enlightenment, of faith, and of progress, which have done you so much honour in the past."

Professor Jean Réville.

"I feel ever more how necessary it is for all friends of liberal religious thought and work to be connected in the different countries in the world. We are nearly everywhere little minorities, but we represent a good cause. Our influence ought to be greater than our number admits of. Thus we want to strengthen one another by mutual assistance. I shall never forget how salutary it was for me to become acquainted with some of your Unitarian brethren in England and in America. And I hope that the Unitarians in England will ever more be conscious that their earnestness and their devotion for the sake of liberal Christianity is a blessing, not only for their countrymen, but all over the world, for all those who are able to read their books and to hear of their works.''

Herr Direktor Schrader.

Herr Schrader, President of the Deutscher Protestantenverein, wrote from Berlin:—

"We beg to thank you and your President for your kind invitation, but much regret not to be able to appoint a delegate to your anniversary meetings. Whit-week is an unfavourable time for the clergy, and those who are not detained by clerical duties are too much occupied with home affairs to be able to leave Berlin. The liberals in the established Churches of Germany are made the subject of a well concerted attack by the orthodox parties, begun in the District Synod in Prussia, and to be continued in the coming Provincial Synods. For this we must be prepared. I hope your Association may take an interest in some printed matter I shall send you on the subject. Possibly it may be in our power to send a representative of our Protestantenverein to the International Congress of Unitarians and other liberal thinkers at Geneva in August this year.''

Telegram received June 13:—

"Hearty greetings and best wishes for the success of your work.—K. Schrader, Deutscher Protestantenverein.''

The Rev. A. Altherr.

The Rev. A. Altherr, writing from Basel on behalf of the Schweizerischer Verein für freies Christenthum, wrote:—

"We very highly appreciate being united to your great Association in the striving after a religious life in the spirit of Jesus Christ. How deep and far-reaching your work is, I see week by week from THE INQUIRER, for which I have to thank you. I have specially rejoiced over the Centenary of James Martineau, who is known to us in Switzerland as the man who laid the greatest stress on religious freedom, and who united with it the truest religious piety. We in Switzerland are to-day celebrating the centenary of Friedrich Schiller, the greatest of all prophets of the better Christendom yet to come. In regard to our Verein, I may say that our 5,200 members are working and fighting, watching and praying that our Churches may more and more be directed away from the Jewish dogmas towards the Life and Spirit of Jesus, with his love and sorrow.''

Miss Westenholz.

Miss Mary B. Westenholz, of Horsholm, Denmark, wrote;—

"I think you must know how dearly I wish that I could have accepted your kind invitation to be present at your meetings in London this year. I would have liked to have been amongst you, listening to the encouraging, inspiring words of your noble—I trust that I may say our noble—leading men, and I would have liked to bring to you our loving, grateful greetings. As I write I seem to see the kind faces full of cheering sympathy and kindly forbearance, turn towards me and, as always when I stand before you, I am longing to tell you about our affairs, our troubles, and our success; to win your approval where you think us right, your advice where you deem us mistaken, and again, as before, I check myself, recognising that I should only waste your time by trying to do what cannot be accomplished. But even while regretting that circumstances compel us to dispense with your wise counsel, I feel that, as it is, you give us something that is of greater value even than understanding and counsel—your confidence. You trust us. I have felt that from the first day I stood amongst you, and I feel it to-day. It has urged us on, even more than good advice and understanding sympathy could do. We thank and bless you for it, and strive and pray that God may make us worthy of it. I cannot close my letter without a few words about the friend we have lost. Daily I realise how much we here in Denmark lost when Mr. Armstrong was taken away, or, as our working people call it, 'promoted.' But at all times I feel that in his friendship we had and have so much more than we lost.''

Mr. Theo Berg also sent cordial greetings from Copenhagen, and Mr. Jochumsson, writing from the same city on the eve of his departure for his home in Iceland, wrote to say how much he regretted that he could not come to the meetings, and sent the most earnest good wishes.

The Rev. C. W. Wendte.

The Rev. Charles W. Wendte, Secretary British and Foreign Unitarian Association, writing from Boston on behalf of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, wrote:—"It gives me much pleasure to inform your Association that all advices received from the local Swiss Committee, and from our fellow-workers in this cause throughout the world, point to a largely attended and successful gathering at Geneva; in no wise falling behind the brilliant sessions previously held in London and Amsterdam, and with unique features due to the new environment and accumulated experience of former congresses. Here in the United States especially, the interest in the International Council has greatly increased, and we shall bring to the Geneva meetings a goodly delegation of our most representative ministers and laymen.

"May we not hope that among our British brethren also the principles and aims of our Council may have grown in favour, and that their representatives at Geneva will be as great in number and distinguished in quality as was the case two years ago in Amsterdam?"

The Rev. Robert Collyer.

"I would love to accept your hearty invitation to come to the anniversary meetings if I was able, but am not, so must plead exemption on account of age. Sydney Smith says that after seventy we must make short contracts, and so what must we do after eighty? The memory of my coming to the meetings thirty-four years ago and the beautiful welcome given me then still stays sweet and fair in my heart, and will while I live, and so it would be I am sure if I could be with you in June, but I do not hope to come again to the dear old Motherland. I have crossed the great ocean seven times on this welcome errand, and am not yet 'as a child that is weaned from his mother,' but the touch of hunger I feel now and then to cross once more holds no pain, and so I am content.''

The Rev. J. T. Sunderland.

The Rev. J. T. Sunderland, of Toronto, after telling of the anniversary meetings at Boston, wrote:—

"A closing word about Canada. Our cause in the Dominion never looked so hopeful as now. Our churches as yet are few, but we have recently organised two new ones (in Winnipeg, Manitoba, and London, Ontario), and have established two or three new preaching stations in important cities. Our old and strong society in Montreal is just building a new and very fine house of worship. The Toronto church has paid its debt which has long been a burden, has put extensive repairs upon its building, and is full of hope and courage. The Society in Hamilton has a new church edifice nearly ready for dedication. I wish to thank your Association for its valuable donation of books and tracts, which have been of great service to us. We are hoping that the time is not very far distant when you, as the Secretary of the Association, may be able to make a visit to our Canadian churches. Trusting that you may have an inspiring and in every way successful Anniversary week in London.''

The Rev. R. Balmforth:

The Rev. R. Balmforth, writing from Cape Town on May 24, said:—"I am sorry I shall not be able to attend the annual meeting of the B. and F.U.A. this year. We in the Colonies miss the inspiration and companionship of such gatherings, and we often feel our isolation keenly. We are more than glad when we hear of a wandering missionary likely to travel our way. Here in South Africa our movement was apparently at a standstill during the war, as, indeed, was natural, for how can we expect a movement which is based on love to God and man to be forwarded by a movement based upon mistrust and hatred? Since the war, however, people's minds have gradually become more accessible to our views and principles. I have very frequent applications for information and literature from all parts of South Africa. Within the last three months I have had two renewed inquiries (from Johannesburg and Kimberley) as to whether our movement could not be permanently organised there, but in places where there is a large fluctuating population, and where public spirit is markedly low, I think it well to urge that local initiative and the formation of local committees should precede any appeal to you. Still, I think much good might be done if the B. and F.U.A., in conjunction, say, with the American Unitarian Association, would organise annual missionary tours to one or other parts of the English-speaking world, for missionary activity not only strengthens our own people, it often spreads fruitful seed throughout the whole religious community."

Similar letters of regret and greeting and good wishes were received from Signor Bracciforti, of Milan; the Rev. P. H. Hugenholz, of Amsterdam; Dr. C. J. Niemeyer, secretary of the Netherlands Protestantenbond; Dr. Oppert, of Berlin; the Rev. P. Jalabert, secretary of the Delegation Liberale des Eglises Reformees de France; Dr. Lunge, of Zurich; Professor Bonet-Maury, of Paris, and Dr. M. J. Savage, of New York. During the week telegrams of greeting were also received from the Rev. Tony André, of Florence; and Professor B. D. Eerdmans of Leiden.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

The following ministers were present at the meetings:—W. Agar, F. Allen, H. Austin, J. Worsley Austin, J. H. Belcher, J. Birks, R. H. U. Bloor, W. Copeland Bowie, S. S. Brettell, S. Burrows, A. A. YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Union was held at Lydgate, near Huddersfield, on Wednesday, June 7. Service was held in the chapel in the afternoon, conducted by the Rev. J. Hanson Green, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, who made an earnest appeal to Unitarians to realise the aims of the Gospel and make practical application of them to life.

After tea the business meeting was held, under the presidency of Rev. Charles Hargrove. Addresses were given by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, who was present as representative of the B. & F. U. A., and the Rev. Dendy Agate, representing the Manchester District Association.

The Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN read the general report, from which it appeared that there had been a considerable response to the recent special appeal, but the regular receipts fell short of the expenses. The Committee urged friends to render such assistance as lay in their power to help on the work of the Union. The financial statement showed a surplus in hand of £84 8s. 1d., against £38 19s. 4d. at the beginning of the financial year. The bazaar fund had amounted altogether to £4,216 2s. 11d., and, after numerous grants to churches and other payments, there still remained in hand £2,711 3s. 5d.

The Rev. J. ELLIS read his report as district minister. They were, he said, fortunate in having in association with the union a band of able and devoted lay preachers, to whom thanks were due for their valuable services. His own visits to the various churches had made it perfectly clear to him that their greatest need to-day was a closer fellowship. Their churches must somehow get into more vital touch with each other if they were effectively to do their share as a denomination in the advancement of the cause of truth, righteousness, and religion. One of the most encouraging features of the year's record was that the Attercliffe congregation at Sheffield, which had been formed as the outcome of the forward movement in 1901, had joined fellowship with the Union. This enterprising community, with the help of other congregations, was making a strenuous effort to provide itself with a religious home. A sum of £1,500 would be needed to provide a school building, and towards this £885 had been promised. An effort was being made to establish a church at Barnsley, which would be a good rallying-point for Leeds, Sheffield, and Wakefield. Satisfactory reports were given on the whole of the progress of the churches at Dewsbury, Doncaster, Elland, Huddersfield, Lydgate, Pepperhill, Pudsey, and Selby. The report from Malton was not so good, and the withdrawal of the resident minister was imminent.

The report and accounts having been adopted, a resolution was unanimously passed expressing appreciation of the long and faithful ministry of the Rev. Iden Payne, and regret that age and infirmity compelled him to relinquish his work; also welcoming into the district the Revs. John Ellis, H. Dawtrey, and H. Cross. Mrs. Mellor, of Huddersfield, daughter of the Rev. Iden Payne, spoke in touching terms in reply to the resolution, and Messrs. Dawtrey and Cross replied to the vote of welcome.

Officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows:—President, Mr. H. Lupton; vice-presidents, the Rev. C. Hargrove, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, Mr. George Webster and Mr. Grosvenor Talbot; secretary, the Rev. A. H. Dolphin; and treasurer, Mr. George Verity.

The chairman handed to the newly-elected treasurer a cheque for £10 from Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough, who thus manifested his love for the Church, his eighty-five years precluding his travelling so far.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting, deploring the bitterness of the controversy which divides the country on the question of the education of its children and the failure of all attempts hitherto made to settle it by means of a conscience clause or of so-called undenominational religious instruction, is of opinion that the only solution of the difficulty lies in confining the province of the State to the provision of secular and moral education, leaving religious instruction to the responsibility of parents and the Churches, to be imparted by them out of school hours, and independently of official control, inspection or assistance, otherwise than by permission to use the school-rooms for the purpose." He regretted to be obliged to move such a resolution, but there was, he believed, no means of peace unless the State confined itself to the support of secular studies only, leaving religion to the parents and the Churches.

Mr. G. O. DODGSON seconded the resolution, which was supported by the Revs. W. R. Shanks, W. Mellor, H. Cross, H. Dawtrey, E. Ceredig Jones, and carried without a dissentient.

The meeting closed with votes of thanks.

BETTER be cold, than affect to feel. In truth nothing is so cold as an assumed, noisy enthusiasm.—Channing.

OBITUARY.

MR. WILLIAM M'CALMONT.

MANY friends will hear with regret of the sudden and unexpected death of Mr. William M'Calmont, of Belfast, which took place on June 11 in the Northern Hospital, Liverpool. Mr. M'Calmont was the head of the firm of Robert M'Calmont & Sons, felt manufacturers, Belfast. He had just returned from a voyage to Buenos Ayres for a needed rest and change. Unfortunately the voyage had not the desired effect, and on his return to Liverpool on Tuesday afternoon he was exceedingly weak, and entered the Northern Hospital, where all that medical skill could do proved unavailing, and death ensued yesterday afternoon. Mr. M'Calmont was in the prime of early manhood, and was known as a most capable business man. His father, the late Robert M'Calmont, F.C.S., was well known in the public life of Ulster as an ardent reformer. Since his father's death in 1890, Mr. M'Calmont extended the business, and in connection with it he was well known in England and Scotland. Like his father, he was a keen student of public affairs, a Liberal in politics, and a member of the Ulster Reform Club. He was well known and highly esteemed in Masonic circles, and was a staunch Unitarian and a liberal subscriber to All Souls' Church and other non-subscribing congregations. His interest in the town of Larne, with which his family had been connected for many generations, was evinced by his handing over a valuable property for the benefit of the town, but his life was spent in Belfast, where as a boy he was educated at the Royal Academical Institution and at the Queen's College, and here his successful business career was passed.

The funeral at the City Cemetery at Belfast on Saturday last was attended by a large number of friends, including many representatives of public bodies. The service was conducted by the Revs. R. Lyttle and W. H. Drummond, both in the chapel and at the grave. Mr. Drummond, in the course of an impressive and sympathetic address, referred specially to Mr. M'Calmont's gift for friendship and to the high honour in which he was held by his friends. It was a fine and beautiful relationship which held men together in real intimacy. Few testimonials to a man's character were worth more than the genuine respect and affection of his men friends. They knew him at his business and in his pleasures, and in rare moments of confidence they saw the real root principle of his life, perhaps the secret cross which he had to bear with cheerful courage. To many of those who were present Mr. M'Calmont had been a friend in his noble way, true-hearted, generous, unselfish. His memory would go with them to inspire and strengthen what was best in their own manhood.

IT takes more knowledge, more integrity, more justice, to handle riches well, than to bear the healthy pinch of just enough.—W. C. Gannett.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

FOR THE CHILDREN WHO KEEP PETS.

Do you remember the chat we had some months ago, about animals, in the INQUIRER? We spoke of the importance of feeding and looking after our pets ourselves, and of trying to understand their needs. But there is something more required if we wish to keep them in health and comfort—knowledge. If the doctor came to see you and did not understand your complaint, he would, of course, be of no use to you. There are no special doctors for our little pets, we must therefore try to learn all we can about them from books, then, if they are ill, or have met with an accident, we may be able to tend them at once. There are many quite inexpensive books written concerning animals. I advise you to buy one that gives particulars of the special pet you happen to possess. There is a very good and cheap one on "Cats," by Lady Cust.

I will tell you two stories of cats which will show you that without knowledge very beautiful animals would have suffered grievously.

I once had a very nice black kitten named "Tim," he is now an old cat living with friends of mine. One morning about 5.30 we were awakened by hearing him squalling loudly, as if in great pain. The cook came and begged us not to go near "Tim," she said he had suddenly become mad!

We ventured, however, to look at him; as he continued to scream, but was quite passive, we lifted him into a basket.

As soon as the shops were open a kind boy ran to the chemist to ask for advice.

The man said: "Your kitten has probably swallowed a mouse whole, and that is causing the pain. Give him no medicine, wrap him in flannel, place him near the fire, and do not let him have any food for eight hours, then he may take a little milk, as he will by that time have probably digested the mouse, skin and all!"

We followed out the directions; gradually the cries of pain ceased, and "Tim" went to sleep. Next day he was as frisky as usual.

I have heard since that sometimes kittens in the excitement of catching their first mouse, open the mouth too wide, and down runs poor little mousie!

My second story is of much later date.

When May and I were sitting in the garden during the summer we often noticed a very fine plump grey cat there. His favourite spot was on one of the flower beds, and of course he always chose to trim his whiskers just where I had planted my young seedlings! May said all her spare time was taken up in sending him away, and that he was so much trouble that she had not a moment for reading or playing with her dolls.

After a time he came no more, and May was quite sure that Prince Grimalkin, as she had named him, had gone to fairyland to fetch a wife! One day I was walking in the garden behind the house when I saw a most extraordinary object, a queer creature, with its mouth open, tail down, and so thin as to be almost a skeleton. I was rather afraid of going very near to it, as it moved about so strangely. However, in a little while it came close to me, and looked very pitifully at me. I went into the house, and told the "Old Lady," the mistress of the old cat. She said at once, "That cat has a bone in his jaw, he cannot close his mouth, and is slowly dying from hunger." I thought the best plan would be to find out where the poor cat lived and tell his mistress. Fortunately it happened to be holiday time, so May was able to join me, and we went alternately to the different houses in the neighbourhood. We could find no owner for poor Prince Grimalkin (May had recognised him by a peculiar mark on his tail!) On my return the Old Lady said: "If you want to save the cat's life, you must put on a pair of thick gardening gloves, place the cat in a bag, open his mouth wide, and take out the bone."

With the help of a friend I determined to follow this advice. Poor Prince Grimalkin was so weak that it was quite easy to catch him. We found a small rabbit bone firmly fixed between his jaws, and with difficulty forced it out.

The poor creature now seemed to be in a dying condition; we gave him a little brandy and milk in a spoon, and then laid him in the outhouse on a nice bed of straw. Here he remained several days, at first fed on milk only from the spoon; later he returned to his natural food.

Prince Grimalkin was so grateful that he decided to come and live with us, and we had great difficulty in making him understand that as we already had two cats he must return to his own home. This he finally did, but he often comes to sit in our garden, looking as handsome as ever. I am sorry to say he continues to choose the special beds which contain our choicest seedlings. May now says it is because he does not know our plans, and really thinks he is doing us a favour by crushing our young plants.

BY A MINISTER.

XXII.

THE word "cant" is nearly as difficult to deal with as the word "enthusiasm." It has kept, however, a smoother course. It has not passed through violent changes of meaning, to become at last almost meaningless, but has borne a fairly even sense throughout. Once a term of gentle ridicule, it is now a term of mild reproach.

Cant, we are told, was, at first, the beggar's chant. Yet who is there that has not his professional sing-song, and why should the beggar's note alone be the note of insincerity?

Cant, in its next stage, was religious cant, and was still an intonation. To Swift, for instance, in his "Discourse concerning the Mechanical Operation of the Spirit," cant, or canting, is, before all else, a speaking through the nose. The art of canting, he adds, is the art of tuning and toning the voice to syllables and single letters. If cant were only this, and always betrayed itself thus, there would be little to fear. We should be at once on our guard, as when we hear the droning of a beetle, or the humming of a gnat. It is the cant without a drawl that should fill us with alarm.

Cant, in its fullest sense, is an affectation of feeling, and in this sense comes home to all conditions of men. Social life is full of simulated emotion, political life of hollow profession, literary life of unreal sentiment, artistic life of unreal effect. Conviction has its cant, and so has doubt; ignorance, and also knowledge; indifference, as well as interest; rudeness, not less than politeness; humility and poverty, as much as pride and wealth; philosophy, equally with religion. But, extend it as we may, cant is never very deep. It is not rank hypocrisy. It is made up of small pretences, the stage properties of convention, of complaisance, of vanity and self-importance, of perfunctory obligation. It is the language of the lips rather than of the heart. It would be excusable, if it would only excuse itself; but cant is the one thing we will not confess, and in this self-justifying habit lies the moral harm.

Cant, it must be sorrowfully allowed, is found most amongst those who think themselves to be the freest from it. This comes from the unconscious ease with which one strong feeling may be substituted for another. A great historian, who has said much in praise of Puritanism, has also said that the Puritans of the second generation mistook their own vindictive feelings for emotions of piety, and, when they had worked themselves up into hating their enemies, imagined that they were only hating the enemies of heaven. The mistake did not begin with them; it was the mistake of more than one of their favourite Old Testament characters; it was the mistake of those Churchmen who looked upon all Puritan objection as hostility to the Church; it is the mistake of every partisan to-day who fails to separate ambition from zeal, jealousy from judgment, private resentment from righteous indignation, and never really knows what manner of spirit he is of.

A common form of cant is that which allows pastime to pose as self-denying toil. Pragmaticus, for example, is never so happy as when he has a public engagement, but he likes it to be thought that he staggers under a load of unsought public service. Benigna and Benevola would be greatly bored at home, but they go their busy rounds, and the relief of weary idleness is dignified with the name of work. The same thing may be said of self-amusement under the guise of charity or of piety. There are forms of entertainment to which increased zest is given by the flavour of what is called a good object. Why do we not say honestly that the good objects are largely our good selves? There are forms, too, of philanthropic association to which we are drawn by social considerations, but we wear the wedding-garment of serious and disinterested motive. Why do we not say plainly that we are playful interlopers?

But, strange as it may seem, the most fruitful source of cant is reverence for the ideal. In morals and religion the highest ideals are always before our eyes, and the phrases which describe them are always in our mouths. They are words of loftiest aim and aspiration. They are words that saints and prophets might be careful to utter, but we use them frequently and in common speech, not because we are saints and prophets, but because, of great and holy things, we do not like to say less than the best that can be said. But overstrained expression is none the less affectation. It certainly excites suspicion. So great is the gulf between speech and practice that there is no life nowadays which is thought to be so unreal as the religious life, unless it be the ethico-political life, which combines equally high profession with equally inadequate performance. Better would it be for us all if we would set our affections on the ideal, and bring our preachings and manifestos into nearer agreement with the actual. Truth, like love, should be without dissimulation.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—Estimates for the new buildings for the Unitarian Congregation have been accepted. The offers are by first-class people, and are within the amount laid out for the buildings. These will consist of church, hall, class-rooms, and church keeper's house. It is hoped the buildings will be ready within a year. The money required (£4,000) is all in hand except the last £1,000, and of that £400 has been promised. The congregation worships at present in the Union Hall.

Bury District Sunday School Union.—The scene at Bank-street Chapel on Sunday last, the occasion of the annual Whit-Sunday Festival in connection with the above Union, was truly an inspiration. The chapel was crowded with teachers and scholars from Ainsworth, Bank-street, Chesham, Heywood, and Strand schools. The hymns and tunes sung were from this year's issue of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and were sung with real gusto, under the leadership of Mr. H. T. Holland, who also acted as organist. The Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans was the preacher, and spoke from the words, "Children of the Holy Spirit."

Horsham.—The 132nd Whitsun-day anniversary was celebrated at the Free Christian Church on June 11, when the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope was the preacher. The subject of the morning sermon was "Salvation by Character," that of the evening "Religious Reaction To-day." Various items of sacred music were rendered by the choir during the day, and visitors were present from London, the neighbourhood of Dorking, Woking, Lewes, and Billingshurst. The communion service was conducted by the Rev. George Lansdowne. Lunch and tea were provided in the schoolroom, under Mrs. Martin's superintendence, and with the assistance of willing helpers. Collections for the funds of the Provincial Assembly, taken at the close of the services, realised between £5 and £6.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual scholars' festival was held in the Free Trade Hall on Whit-Sunday afternoon, when about 1,600 scholars and teachers occupied the body of the hall, and the gallery was well filled with friends. The president of the Union (the Rev. W. Holmshaw) conducted the service, and gave an interesting and appropriate address on "Be Strong." A combined choir of about 150 voices, conducted by Mr. Fred Whittaker (Bradford), led the hymns, and sang two anthems, and Mr. Arthur J. Baker, R.M.C.M., officiated at the organ. Amongst those on the platform were the Revs. T. P. Spedding (Rochdale), B. C. Constable (Stockport), C. Roper, B.A., W. E. Atack, W. E. George, M.A., H. J. Rossington, M.A., S. A. Steinthal, A. W. Timmis, J. W. Bishop, Messrs. T. F. Robinson, J. Wigley, T. Parry, Henry Woodhead (treasurer), and F. Golland (secretary).

Walthamstow.—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held on Sunday, June 4. The Flower Service from the Essex Hall Hymnal was well rendered both afternoon and evening by the scholars and choir, and conducted by the Rev. W. H. Rose, who also gave two interesting and instructive addresses on "Flowers."

THE divinity is stirring within the human breast, and demanding a culture and a liberty worthy of the child of God.—Channing.

THE spiritual impressions which a true Christian receives from the character and teachings of Christ, and in which the chief efficacy of the religion lies, can be poorly brought out in words. Words are but brief, rude hints of a Christian's mind: His thoughts and feelings overflow them: To those who feel as he does, he can make himself known, for such can understand the tones of the heart; but he can no more lay down his religion in a series of abstract propositions, than he can make known in a few vague terms the expressive features and inmost soul of a much-loved friend. It has been the fault of all sects that they have been too anxious to define their religion. They have laboured to circumscribe the infinite. Christianity, as it exists in the mind of the true disciple, is not made up of fragments, of separate ideas which he can express in detached propositions. It is a vast and ever-unfolding whole, pervaded by one spirit, each precept and doctrine deriving its vitality from its union with all. When I see this generous, heavenly doctrine compressed and cramped in human creeds, I feel as I should were I to see screws and chains applied to the countenance and limbs of a noble fellow-creature, deforming and destroying one of the most beautiful works of God.—Channing.

DR. JOHN HUNTER, of Glasgow, and recently of the King's Weigh House Church, it will be seen from an advertisement in another column, is to preach on Sunday morning and on the five following Sunday mornings at the Bechstein Hall, Wigmore-street, W. On Sunday evening, our readers will remember, the Rev. Stopford Brooke is again to preach at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR record of the Whit-week meetings is completed in the present issue. For Dr. Mellone's address on the "Two Centenaries: James Martineau and Francis William Newman," our readers must look to its separate publication; but Mr. Freeston's paper is given in full, and there is a long report of the speeches at the public meeting. The complete text of the Rev. Alexander Webster's address on the Church crisis in Scotland is given, and in this connection we may refer our readers to the last number of the "Scotch Tracts for the Times," a sermon by the Rev. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh, on "The Bible and the Churches in Scotland."

THE conclusion of the President's address at the Public Meeting raises again the perennial question of the introduction of "party" politics into religious meetings. We are inclined to agree with Mr. Kenrick's predecessor, that a true distinction in this matter is not easy to make. The question of the drink traffic is unfortunately hotly a question of party politics, and so is the question of religious education in the schools. Ought we then to refrain from touching such questions in the representative gatherings of our Churches? Or must we only touch upon those public questions on which we are all certainly agreed? The great field of party politics undoubtedly needs to be cleansed, and political controversy to be lifted to a higher level. The real difficulty, as regards the churches, seems to be that political controversy rouses such bad passions, that if introduced into a church meeting, it is sure to destroy the harmony of mutual respect and brotherly fellowship. But ought that to be the case? Ought we not rather to learn to conduct our political discussions in a worthier manner, and may not the fact that our churches must concern themselves with such questions, compel, at last, a worthier temper in their treatment?

WHILE Russia and Japan have agreed, on the invitation of President Roosevelt, to a meeting of their representatives at Washington to consider terms of peace, the Tsar has taken what may prove to be a decisive step of progress towards the better government of his country. On Monday he received a deputation from the Moscow Congress of Zemstvos, and after listening to some home-truths from Prince Troubetzkoi, promised to call a National Assembly. In the course of his speech, he said:—"My will is the "sovereign and unalterable will, and the "admission of elected representatives to "the works of the State will be regularly "accomplished. I watch every day and "devote myself to this work. You may "announce that to all your friends dwelling in the country as well as in towns. "I am firmly convinced that Russia will "emerge strengthened from the trials she "is undergoing, and that there will be "established soon, as formerly, a union "between the Tsar and all Russia, a "communion between myself and the "men of the Russian soil."

THE King of Sweden, in an extraordinary session of the Riksdag on Wednesday, gave his assent to the measure introduced by his Government for the purpose of carrying out the dissolution of the union between Sweden and Norway, which the latter country had declared. Painful as it was to him, the King took that step, he said, "in the conviction that a union without mutual accord would bring no real advantage to Sweden." It was on June 7 that the Norwegian Storthing declared for independence. The union entered into in 1814 had led to much friction, and finally to an impossible situation, and Norway thereupon re-assumed its independence.

"The Union was justified," the Storthing declared in an address to the King, "so long as it could contribute to the "welfare and happiness of both peoples, "while maintaining their independence as "Sovereign States. But above the "union there stands for us Norwegians "our Norwegian Fatherland, and for the "Swedes their Swedish Fatherland, and "more valuable than a political union "are the feeling of solidarity and voluntary cohesion of both peoples. The "union has become a danger to this "feeling of solidarity between the Norwegian and Swedish peoples which "should secure the happiness of both "nations and constitute their strength "abroad. If the union is now severed, the "Norwegian people have no loftier wish "than to live in good harmony with all, "not least with the people of Sweden "and the dynasty under the direction of "which our country, despite many and "bitter disputes affecting the union, has "attained such important intellectual "and material development. The day "upon which the Norwegian people "elect their own King to ascend the "ancient throne of Norway will open up "an era of more tranquil conditions of "labour for Norway, of good and cordial "relations with the Swedish people, and "of peace and concord and loyal co-operation in the North for the protection of "the culture of the peoples and of their "freedom and independence."

It is matter for great thankfulness that no attempt has been made to maintain the union by force.

WE have recorded in recent years visits made by German experts to England to investigate housing arrangements, lodging houses, and municipal enterprise in the English towns. A British committee is now travelling on the Continent for the study of Foreign Municipal Institutions. The Committee includes a number of Mayors, Aldermen, and members of the Corporation of the City of London, County Councillors, and Borough Councillors. Aachen, Antwerp, Brussels, Liége, and Cologne have been visited. A week is to be spent at Berlin. When the Committee was received at the Rathhaus by the Oberburgermeister of Aachen, he heartily welcomed the visitors on their entrance into Germany, and expressed the hope that their visit would stimulate municipal progress in both countries, and increase friendly relations between the two nations. Lord Lyveden replied. Sir John Gorst is of the party. There is much to be learned by willing interchange of ideas, and investigation of results in other nations. Germany has made great advance in municipal government, and some of the methods and results are worthy of very careful study.

IN our congratulations last week, on the result of the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos we omitted to mention Miss M. S. Barlow, of Girton, a daughter of Dr. Barlow, of Glasgow, who was classed among the Senior Optimes, her name standing first in that list. In Part II. Mr. F. J. M. Stratton (Caius), of Birmingham, who last year was Third Wrangler, was in the second division of Class I., and to him the Tyson Medal was awarded.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

PUBLIC MEETING.

At the public meeting held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening, June 14th, the President of the Association, Hon. WILLIAM KENRICK, took the chair.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, spoke with unqualified admiration of the work of the Association, of the spirit in which it was carried on by the committee and officers. He could heartily recommend the Association to the support of all liberal-minded religious men. The value of such an organisation was obvious. It not only linked together the churches and chapels of their religious body at home in a bond of union by which the strong and prosperous were able to help the weaker and more isolated members, evoking in all a common sympathy in a common cause; it also connected religious thought at home with that of the Continent of Europe, North America, Asia, and Australasia. The more they thought of that the more important would it appear. When they noticed the small additions that were made to the members of their congregations, it was some comfort to look abroad and find themselves associated with thoughtful men in other countries. Far from despairing of their lot in England, they must be inspired by the reflection that the whole civilised world in its thought and its higher aspirations seemed to be tending in the direction in which they desired it to tend. For his part—and he believed they would feel with him—he could not help being convinced that there was a great wave of truth which was destined to sweep away every obstacle of obscurantism and superstition, and that they were mounted on the top of that wave. They would feel that more and more the more faithful they were in doing their own part. They must push forward with strenuous exertions if they wished to accomplish anything in this world. He was afraid Unitarians were sometimes so satisfied with the strength of their position that they thought the position would not only hold its own but carry the world, without their making any personal sacrifice or using any personal endeavour. They must see how fatal such an idea was. In the history of the world and of the beliefs of the world, they knew full well that human endeavour was always necessary for human conviction. That was a truism, but it was sometimes necessary to insist even on truisms. He might be tempted to say something more on the subject were it not that Professor Carpenter, in the address which he delivered in that hall last year on the outlook of liberal religion, had said all that he (the speaker) wished to say, and had said it fortified with authority resulting from long study of the subject to which he could lay no claim. He wished to acknowledge his indebtedness to that admirable work by Mr. Carpenter, "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," the origin and publication of which was due to that Association, and which, he ventured to think, was an extremely valuable study of the subject. The diffusion of such a work was honourable to the Association, as the work itself reflected the highest credit on the author. Proceeding to speak of what he had himself observed of the great stride made by religious thought during the last fifty years, the President referred to his own training in "the older Unitarianism of Priestley and Belsham," and his attendance for many years on the ministry of the Rev. Samuel Bache, first at the New Meeting, Birmingham, and afterwards at the "Church of the Messiah," so named at the express desire of Mr. Bache himself. Mr. Bache's earnest championship of the miraculous as the only basis for Christianity represented a standpoint which he supposed no Unitarian preacher of the present day would adopt. And, turning to other bodies, he noted the Bishops' uncompromising attitude in the matter of the creeds in spite of the desire expressed by some to be spared the reading of the Athanasian Creed. In conclusion the President spoke as follows:

"I now wish to refer to two topics treated by my predecessor in his address last year. The first was that the time had come, or was coming, when part of the work of your Committees might be delegated to some of the District Associations in conference, as I take it, with the Central body. Mr. Sharpe expressed the opinion that 'A great deal of the home mission work might thus be delegated; and, also, responsibility being thrown upon these district associations, would create opportunity, and opportunity would create the men to do the work.' I am inclined to agree with the views of your late President. Such a delegation, in my opinion, need not impair the influence of the Central Association, or relax the bonds of union uniting the whole Unitarian community, while it would, I believe, stimulate local interest and local effort—a consummation devoutly to be wished. The second subject treated by Mr. Sharpe, on which I wish to remark, had reference to the introduction of politics into the deliberations of your Council. On this subject he pronounced the dictum: 'What was wanted was not to bring politics into religion, but to bring religion to bear upon politics.' I think this declaration of the relationship between politics and religion will be generally acceptable. I at least accept it. But Mr. Sharpe went on to say, that 'this was a very nice distinction.' Well, I think that depends upon what you mean by politics. If you mean general principles underlying both public and private conduct, I agree it is not easy to distinguish them from the essentials of our religion, but, if you mean party politics, in which the same principles may be differently interpreted and applied, on a different understanding of facts, and circumstances, by two parties, equally sincere, and equally desirous that truth and righteousness should prevail, then I think the distinction is not only easily drawn, but should be rigidly observed. Otherwise I do not see how harmony is to prevail in a Society in which are to be found members of all political parties. Your President has the power to decide when questions so introduced are ultra vires; and I hope, with Mr. Sharpe, that this power will always be exercised to promote harmony, and in securing the main purpose for which this Association exists. For my own part, I may say that no such question has arisen during my year of office, and I have besides to thank the Council and your Secretary for much personal kindness and consideration. As I have already said, I have learnt something of the good work carried on by this Association, and of their devotion to the cause of those who carry on its beneficent labours. So far it has been for me a pleasant and profitable experience, for which I give you my hearty thanks."

Theology and Religion in Australasia.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A. (Leeds), said that our countrymen in the Southern Hemisphere had the advantage, or disadvantage, over us of having a religious census. He found from that census that in every hundred inhabitants of Australia and New Zealand, forty returned themselves as members of the Episcopal Church, or, as we should call it, the Church of England; and twenty-one as Roman Catholics. Twenty-six were about equally divided between Presbyterians and Methodists, and four were Baptists or Congregationalists. That was to say, that out of every hundred people ninety-three were returned as belonging to one of the leading denominations, leaving only seven to be divided between Lutherans—there were some villages which were almost entirely Lutheran—Plymouth Brethren, Quakers, and Jews, and the small number who refused, as they were allowed to by law, to state to which religion they belonged. He had not a separate return—though there was one to be had—of the number of people in Australia who returned themselves as Unitarians, but there were fourteen hundred who declared themselves to belong to the Australian Church, which was practically the same. In New Zealand six in ten thousand declared themselves to be Unitarians. What conclusion were they to draw from those statistics? It was often said that Australians were indifferent to or even hostile to religion. He thought that those statistics were sufficient to refute this accusation. The first conclusion he drew from the census was that beyond all question there was an outward regard for religion in Australasia. There was no obligation on anyone to return themselves as members of any church, and there was no advantage in doing so. When he found then that so large a number—something like 98 per cent.—returned themselves as belonging to a religious body, it seemed to him that that fact effectually quashed the assertion that Australians were indifferent to religion. The second conclusion he drew was that the Church which was here called the Church of England retained its prestige and retained the affection of English people even when it had no endowment and no State recognition. It was a very remarkable fact that 40 per cent. of the people in Australia, and nearly 50 per cent. in Tasmania, should hold by the Episcopal Church when there was none of the prestige associated with it in England.

No doubt fashion accounted for it to a large extent. People of the world who have no religious convictions would belong to the community which "society" favoured whether at home or wherever English people are settled. Still, it seemed to him that the reason for so large a number of people belonging to the Episcopal Church was to be found in its own attractions, and its services to the people, at least as much as in outer merits which it possessed; and another reason no doubt was that the Church of England, more than any other Church, was ubiquitous. Thirdly, he drew the conclusion that nominal or professed churchmanship did not imply that a man held or assented to the creeds of a particular Church, or conformed to it as a sound churchman, as it was termed. He did not think anyone would maintain that, and he believed that a great deal of the pessimism in respect to religion, which was so common amongst all the "orthodox" sects in Australia, was due to the consciousness that this outward membership of a Church did not bring with it an adherence to the formulas of that body. He thought the whole statistics went to prove that our Australian brethren felt as much as we felt the need of religion—not very deeply perhaps; but neither did we. But they did feel the need for it, and they were not content to be simply Agnostics. They kept a hold on religion, though it might be with the left hand and not with the right. He was satisfied that all the talk about people in Australia being irreligious was the talk of the elders of every generation about the younger people. In a leading article of one of the principal newspapers published in Brisbane he found a broad statement of exactly the religion which Unitarians desired to preach and promote—a religion in which theology and dogma counted for little, and which left ritual perfectly free. He had no doubt that the views of this advanced Liberal paper really expressed the views of some 10 per cent. of the Australian people. It had been said that there were tens of thousands of Unitarians in the Church of England. He had not the slightest doubt that that was still more true in Australia. People held to this broad religious view:—"Thou shalt love thy God and thy neighbour." Here was an opportunity for Unitarians, not to aggrandise themselves as a sect, but to offer that which many were demanding, a religion as free as possible from sectarian bonds and from dogma of all kinds. Here was an opportunity for them to take to Australasia a religion which asked nothing of its followers except to feel right towards God and man and to do the right. And the opportunity was a very large one, for he did not believe there was any centre of population in Australasia where such a Gospel would not be welcome.

Do We Make the Best Use of Sunday?

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, discussing the best use to make of Sunday, said he presumed, in that room at any rate, there would be no difference of opinion as to whether or not public worship should occupy a part of the day. The only consideration was, what portion should be allotted to it, at what hour, and what form it should take. Worship was an instinct, born in every child that came into the world. Public worship was the natural development of that instinct. He did not believe there ever lived any men or women, however good, however clever, however distinguished, however high in the scale of manhood or womanhood, who did not worship God in the company of their fellows, who would not have been not only better but happier had they habitually attended public worship. Worship was the natural expression of the reality of our faith in the Fatherhood of God. Public worship was the expression of our belief in the brotherhood of man. It might be said there were natures that could worship better alone in the privacy of their own chambers, or in the open fields under the dome of heaven, than in a crowded congregation. Did not our Lord himself enjoin us to seek seclusion when we prayed? Yes, but why did he condemn the hypocrites? Not for praying in public, but for their low motive for so doing. There had been long and dreary discussions in the papers as to why people did not go to church. The answer was, to his mind, a very simple one. Mainly because the instinct in the child had not been fostered and encouraged, but too often neglected, if not actually thwarted or destroyed. Did they ever know a child of parents who habitually attended church who did not like to go—nay, often, if not generally, who did not look upon it as one of the greatest pleasures in the week? Why should that feeling die out? It should naturally become stronger as intelligence increased and the growing intellect came to understand more and more what it all meant. But as it was, in many families the children too early discovered that what they looked upon as a privilege and pleasure was considered by their elders a bore, and shirked on the slightest excuse. Young men especially were encouraged too early to look upon it as a disagreeable duty to be got out of if possible, or a thing for women and children, not for them. At school probably it was a daily task, and at college a means of checking attendances to take the place of "calling over." And so very naturally as soon as they were free they preferred to go bicycling or golfing, or to amuse themselves in any other way—or, worst of all, to lie in bed. Their parents, as a rule, winked at, if they did not actually encourage, that view of things. "Poor boys, it is quite natural. Let them do just as they like!" Yes, by all means let them do just as they like, but take care that going to church for one short hour is what they do like! We could do that, if we chose; but we did not take the trouble. He had known families, many of them, where to shirk church was as little thought of as to shirk school or business; where parents and children attended regularly without the slightest question. And, looking back upon their lives, he could see the influence for good that the practice had upon them. He was convinced that, were the habit universal, many a household would be saved from failure and sorrow. He did not for a moment say there were not thousands who seldom or never went to church, who led good, useful, and happy lives, but he was firmly convinced, after half a century's experience and not a little thought on the subject, that had they cultivated the habit of regular attendance at public worship they would not only have been better and happier, but more useful in the world. What portion of the day, then, should public worship occupy, and what form should it take? He did not think that a sermon was a necessary part of a religious service. It was not worship, and was in no way essential to it. For his own part, he preferred a service which did include a sermon, even when he attended twice a day. But the essential thing was the worship, and that could be obtained with any short simple service without any address. Probably what would serve the purpose best, and at the same time prove most acceptable, would be a service of praise and prayer not longer than three-quarters of an hour or an hour, and the more beautiful the rendering and the surroundings the better. As to the time, he thought the present arrangement a mistake, cutting up practically the whole morning. Would not 9.30 or 10 o'clock do better, especially for town workers? And for the rest of the day he should say let each one use it as he thought best, with due regard to the convenience of others. Let the workers in town get out into the country, breathe as much fresh air, and take as much healthy exercise as possible. To them he would say:—Take bicycle rides, play tennis, golf, hockey—what you will. Not only enjoy yourself, but strengthen your bodies and minds so that you may the better do the work that lies before you during the coming week. Tire yourselves healthily, so that you may be glad to get to bed early (which is far better than lying in bed late), and wake up on Monday morning refreshed and invigorated. Try to make the day quite different from the other six—a day for social intercourse and change of ideas. Above all, a happy, cheerful day for yourselves and all those around you.

There was one class of workers whose unselfish labour they must accept and beg for—the teachers in our Sunday-schools. That was a matter never to be forgotten in discussing the use made of Sunday. It was a work of paramount importance which secular schools had not and never could take the place of.

His experience of the Government schools was that there was no real religious teaching in them at all. What was there given was a poor mixture of Biblical history and weak theology. He did not believe that under the present circumstances any worthy religious teaching could be given in those schools, and he was not afraid to offer his decided opinion that the State should confine itself to secular teaching alone, and leave the religious teaching to those qualified to give it, viz., the Churches themselves. The managers and teachers in their Sunday-schools must therefore press on their noble work with zeal and discretion, for it was the only chance of saving the coming generations from leading godless lives. Reverting to the question of public worship, he said it was not necessary for it to be treated as a thing to be done first, certainly it should not be viewed merely as a duty that should be got over and done with. The Churches did not encourage as much as they might do travellers to alight and rest for an hour or so on their journeys. They should for people to stop on their way and attend any church they might pass. Every such building should have a bicycle shed, and young people should be encouraged to go in—invited by notice—it being understood that no one would stare at, or object to, Norfolk suits or bicycle skirts or dusty boots. In what he had said, he had prescribed for workers only—those who were busy all the week. He did not know what to say to the idlers, those who preferred to enjoy themselves every day. They would not care in the least what he or anyone else said, otherwise he would suggest that they, too, might be all the better for a change. It must get very fatiguing to play bridge every day in the week. They must want a change as much as others. Probably a good hard day's work would be the best prescription for them, seasoned with a little wholesome thought for others and a forgetfulness of their own selfish pleasure. He did not mean that there was any particular virtue in earning one's own living. It was a wholesome discipline which few could do without. But he knew that there were thousands who worked just as hard for others (not themselves), and whose noble lives showed that there was no need to suggest to them how their Sundays or any other days should be spent.

Revivals and Revivalism.

The Rev. GEORGE CRITCHLEY had some misgivings that the subject assigned to him, "Revivals and Revivalism," had lost a considerable portion of its pressing interest, because the two movements which were its occasion were already becoming stale sensations of the day. No doubt, as far as the London movement was concerned, thorough organisation, skilful advertisement, and lavish expenditure, under the direction of a man of unquestionable ability in his own particular line, would keep a large number of people together to the close of the campaign, but a certain increasing acridity in the tone of the leader's remarks and a sort of fierce determination to get some kind of response out of what was—on the occasion, at least, when he himself was present—a rather reluctant audience, suggested the idea that the work had not laid any large hold on the people of London, and that Dr. Torrey was becoming conscious of the fact. As to the Welsh revival, if the latest reports were not simply malignant misrepresentations, it seemed to be undergoing rapid dispersion and disintegration under those influences which from the time of Tertullian and Montanism had always been the abiding peril of movements of that character, viz., that sense and simplicity should be replaced by spiritualistic extravagance, and the leader become possessed of the idea that in some special and mysterious way he had become the depository of the Holy Ghost. So that whatever genuine spiritual force might have been folded in the beginnings of that movement it appeared to be wasting itself in irrational excitement, and would presently disappear. He was launching no attack on "Revivals" as a whole. Some one wrote regretfully in one of their papers recently, in reference to religious Revival, "This is not for us." If the meaning was, "This kind of revival is not for us," it was true, and thank God for it! But if it meant, "No revival is for us," that would simply imply that religion had lost its vitality, and they were on the way to petrefaction and decay. Long ago Dr. Martineau sought to teach them that there were "Tides of the Spirit," and to assert that "No revival is possible for us" was to make the melancholy confession that they had lost touch with the great flood of spiritual life and energy, which ebbed and flowed throughout the universe of God. It was not against revivals as a whole that he levelled the faintest shadow of attack, but an experience stretching over something like forty years had led him to regard the two familiar forms of revival, which had recently reappeared, as false, mischievous, and diseased. As to the London movement, the less worthy and the less Christian of the two, one could not fail to note the thoroughly up-to-date and business-like manner in which it had been "conducted"—the colloquialism "got up" would be the better phrase. Advance agents, a lavish expenditure, distinguished patronage, extensive advertisements, buildings of imposing dimensions—all the approved commercial methods by which huge crowds were gathered together for a circus or a theatre, or by which an article of merchandise, say an encyclopædia, was commended to the attention of the public! But how singularly remote it all was from the signs of a genuine movement of the Divine Spirit upon the hearts of the people, and of the spontaneous response of quickened faculty and awakened desire for good unknown before. Nor could they fail to be impressed with the harsh, almost malignant, temper in which all who differed from the theological position on which the London Mission was based had been denounced. Dr. Torrey's insinuations levelled against themselves that the majority of those who rejected the Deity of Christ did so because "they love sin" was well known, and had received the castigation it deserved; nor should they forget that the castigation had come from outside their own denomination as well as from within. It was not Dr. Torrey's temper only which revealed itself in those charges, it was the temper of a whole school, and in a less civilised age it would light the flame of persecution throughout the land. And in the name of what a barbaric theology it was done! A Revival of Religion? Nay, rather, a resurrection of religious savagery, which one had learnt to hope was past and gone.

The Welsh Revival was confessedly of a different kind. It grew around a striking and even engaging personality, and certainly depended on nothing in the shape of "up-to-date" business organisation for its swift and remarkable success during the first months of its career. Its central figure was that of a visionary, whose recorded experiences bore a singular resemblance to those of the class to which he belonged. And the visionary tendency, even when balanced by intellectual culture and considerable common sense, was always a perilously unwholesome condition of mind. The end was usually an exaggerated egotism, often amounting to mental disease. He (the speaker) said a few months ago that he believed Evan Roberts to be honest and sincere. He would not even now withdraw those words, but he should repeat them to-day with a shadow of misgiving. A not unsympathetic writer in the Daily Chronicle had said in the previous week: "That the Evan Roberts of May, 1905, is the Evan Roberts of December, 1904, no one can seriously contend. There has been a development, a transformation. . . . He has been encouraged by the eagerness with which every suggestion of supernatural power has been greeted to abandon the restraint of an impulse deeply implanted in human nature, but nevertheless irrational. And the result may be seen in the week of silence, when, like the veiled prophet of Khorassan he retired from the world, the cryptic messages, often incoherent the violent emotions, publicly manifested, the frequent pose as thought-reader, as the direct exponent of the Divine Will; and so the end has come, or is apparently near. The voice of criticism is making itself heard; extravagance is producing the inevitable reaction." It is a tale often told in the history of emotional religion, striving to make the shortest way into the realities of God, and losing itself in the delusions of insanity. What would come of it all? Humanity learned by its mistakes, and those mistakes might be, after all, halting steps in the direction of the final religion of humanity.

The Social Mission of the Church.

Rev. W. L. SCHROEDER, of Manchester, spoke on "The Social Mission of the Church." The times certainly called for action, he said. Nobody could stay in London for a couple of days without feeling that. As he looked upon the scenes of squalor, and the unheeding throng in the London streets, he could not but ask, What has London Unitarianism to say to this, and how is the social mission of the Church being fulfilled? If they were possessed by the spirit of Christ, they ought to go forward and do something in the highest and truest way. The social mission of the Church was to be found in the relation of the individual to the Unseen, and to other individuals. We needed to know how they affected each other, and through whom. In his opinion the Church was not synonymous with religion. Religion is co-terminous with life. The Church dealt with but one phase of life, but most of those present would doubtless consider that to be the most important phase, for it dealt primarily with the relation of the soul to God. The minister who tried to beguile himself into the belief that he was fulfilling the function of the Church when he organised whist parties, and occupied the time of his young people with all kinds of pleasures, was surely labouring under the greatest mistake possible. For although it was possible to work through these phases of religion, the duty of the Church and the duty of the minister was concerned with those spiritual realities which we realised so seldom in our lives. We could not delegate this duty to any other institution; the Church of God must consider the eternal verities, must be some kind of witness to eternal life in the midst of time, and must stand in practice for the fulfilment of spiritual ideals. The function of the Church ought not to be impaired by the intrusion of these secondary phases. It was not a question of doing something good, but doing the best possible. When we allowed ourselves to be beguiled by what we regarded as the necessities of the case, we were only playing fast and loose with reason, for when we consult experience, amid which reason argues, we are driven to this thought—that the better life of humanity is realised when men know themselves as children of the Father, when they are conscious of the life of God in their midst, and when, with the love welling forth from their hearts, they give themselves up to service for the sake of the brethren. To his mind the relation which made all life a beautiful vision of holiness, the relation between the individual soul and the eternal God, was that to which the Church should primarily turn its attention. On what should they proceed? On the validity of the spiritual life—the fact that it may be true, and that God may work in the hearts of men and women; that it was no mere sentimental thought. Unitarians ought to arouse themselves to a deeper sense of their functions as a Church. Until they realised the spiritual life in all its tremendous force, they might support their Associations, send out their missionaries, and organise in this way and that way; but they would never reach the hearts of the people if they lacked just the very spirit of Christ which made the Gospel of Christianity. The method of working must be from experience to God, and thence to life. From this point of view it might seem that the Church had no social mission, that it was concerned merely with the cultivation of one phase of life; but the function of the Church dealt with the relation of the soul to God, and God was found in the life of humanity. We must learn that by the love of the Father we could so express spiritual principles that those who were in darkness might be led into the light, and that those who suffered might be made to feel the joy of being within the Kingdom of God. Here, then, lay the opportunity of every community bound together in love. Let each of the members see that he lived as God would have us live, and resolve—

> "I will not cease from mortal fight,
> Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand,
> Till we have built Jerusalem
> In England's green and pleasant land."

The Church Crisis in Scotland.

The Rev. ALEXANDER WEBSTER gave the last address on "True and False Views of Comprehension: the Free Church Crisis in Scotland." It had to be much curtailed in delivery. The complete text is here given:—

On approaching my subject, I am reminded of a typical character introduced with sympathetic insight by Ian Maclaren, in his story "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." He is called James Soutar. "When James was in good fettle he could trace the whole history of Scottish secession from the beginning, winding his way through the maze of Original Seceders and Cameronians, Burghers and Anti-Burghers with unfaltering step." It was admitted, even in Drumtachty, that James had "a gift o' discrimination." Such discrimination was part of the ordinary learning of the Secession period, a necessity of common sectarian life.

Intellect then, as Maclaren says, had been brought to so fine an edge by the Shorter Catechism that it could detect endless distinctions, and so serious was the pious mind over each distinction that it was made a reason for separation.

To those who have not the fine-edged Catechism intellect, the phenomena of Scottish Sectarianism must remain a mystery. Without the atmosphere, the nurture, the disposition, and the fear of God, in which they had their being, they are a puzzle.

Even in Scotland there is sometimes difficulty felt in explaining sectarian differences. It is told of two Celts, who met at Dingwall recently, that they were comparing kirks. One asked the other: "Can you tell me the difference between the Frees and the United Frees?"

"Oh, there is a great difference; but I have no time to tell you."

"Come, now; you have plenty of time."

"Well, then; I am no learned enough to tell you."

"Ach, come now, Donald; you are surely learned enough to give a reason for the faith that is in you?"

"No; I am no learned enough, and I have no time."

"Ach, Donald, you are like the rest of the Wee Frees—you can't tell the difference; and I have asked a dozen of you."

Donald, rising from his seat and excitedly hitting the platform with his stick:—"Aye, but I do know, and I will tell you when you'll know, and that will be at the Day of Judgment. When you see a' us Wee Frees going up to heaven, and a' you United Frees going down to hell. You will know then, and you will know there, and it will be bad for you."

We are far enough now from the Sectarian period, with its finical bigotries, to be in a mood to analyse it humorously. It is indeed already in the hands of the novelist and philosopher, for tender survey.

What we have to perceive primarily in connection with the present crisis is the endeavour, in the middle of the seventeenth century, by clerical authority, to form a believing notion by means of a Catechism.

What the Levitical code was intended to be for Israel, the Catechism was designed to be for the Scotch. It was to be the instrument of solidifying the nation on a Calvinistic basis. The idea was almost sublime in its presumption, and suicidal in its accomplishment.

The purpose of the Confession and Catechism was solemnly avowed. It was to produce a Covenanted uniformity of religion between the Churches of Christ in the Kingdom of Scotland, England, and Ireland. Though the uniformity was not established, the pious Scot to this hour speaks of the "Covenant" with profound emotion. It has to him a peculiar solemnity, for it cost his forefathers much blood, and his foremothers many tears. The foolishness of Covenanting for dogmatic monotony stands exposed all through ecclesiastical history, but perhaps there is no example of it more obviously unwise than that furnished by Scottish dogmatism. Nature aims at comprehension, but she does it on a universal principle; the radical fault of the Scottish ecclesiastic was that he sought inclusion on a partial notion. A Scotch mother knows she cannot make a man of her son on oatmeal only; she must add to it fresh air and the elements of rationality. The Scottish spiritual father protected the Catechism, and prescribed it for all the needs of the soul. Of course, the soul revolted. It would not be tethered to the manual, and soon was found "trailing the baikey." At the present moment the three Presbyterian churches in Scotland are in the throes of a catastrophe. The Established section, amid the decay of Calvinism, is endeavouring to melt the tough iron of her ancient fetters, but finds the metallic fibres very tenacious. The section calling itself "United Free" is rent in twain, and fighting for property. More or less clearly the two main sections have become conscious of the supreme futility of attempts at conformity, and are clamouring at the door of Parliament for relief from the ruinous result of ancient bigotry. That is what the case means: The Presbyterians fettered themselves mentally 250 years ago, and now they are beseeching legislation for a dissolution of the voluntary bondage. The slave's hour comes at last, but it is very humiliating for him to beg to have his chains knocked off. Whatever apology may be made for the standards of the Reformed Church of 1649, it is plain that in their setting up they were meant to be final. They were Protestant, Calvinistic, and Presbyterian, and intended to remain so. The authority that superseded the Papacy was equally autocratic, and made no allowance for variation. The Reformed Kirk allied itself with the State, and by ratifying its creed the State settled the basis of its possession of property. By its own hand the Church bound up its beliefs and its belongings with the Confession of Faith for all time coming. Hebraic in his selfishness, the Scotch Calvinist imagined that Scotland was predestined to be Calvinistic, and that he was commissioned by God to drive out Papists, Prelatists, Antinomians, and other ungodly bastards from the realm.

He called his edict of clearance the "Confession of Faith," but it was really an exposure of faithlessness. You will search the literature of dogmatism in vain for any manifesto with so much unfaith in reason, in light, and in progress as is contained in the Confession of Faith, from which relief is now sought.

Scotland has at last become conscious of the failure of dogmatism. The pain and shame of the theological fetter are deeply felt. The larger sections of Presbyterians are engaged in reversing history, and are humbly asking absolution from the sin of bigotry. They are returning in awe to glean up the scattered ashes of heresy into History's golden urn. Caiaphas went to Pilate to arrange for a crucifixion; the penitent ecclesiastic of to-day goes to the Premier for a Commission to take down the cross his forefathers set up.

It should be distinctly understood that the founders of the Reformed Church did not conceive the possibility of its ever being other than Calvinistic and Presbyterian. They made no provision for any modification. They always upheld the Confession in an absolute way, and treated as heretics all who in any wise departed from it in thought and practice. The Church of Christ, in their view, could never comprehend any but themselves. Calvinism was synonymous with the Kingdom of Heaven.

The founders of the Free Church in 1843 distinctly declared that they held to the confession and other standards "as heretofore understood." The new sect bound itself to the old standards in the traditional sense. Its variation was political, not theological. It originated explicitly as a Calvinistic Church and up to the passing of its Declaratory Act in 1892 it continued to be Calvinistic on the old lines. It was only when it realised that its dogmatic persistence was costing it its best men that it modified its profession. The opposition to the Declaratory Acts was the first sign of the present crisis. The Act was forced from the Church by the pressure of science without and the strain of humanism within, and gave relief to the conscience regarding the dogma of creation in six days and other dogmas. The Highland host rose up against the concession, and insisted that the Confession should stand as it was. But the Act was passed, though under strong protest. The Church lost its hold of the Highlands because of it. "Caledonia stern and wild" would not submit to any softening of the rigours of Calvinism.

But the last fibres of Celtic connection were not severed till 1900. Then on the union of the U.F. Church with the United Presbyterian Church, there was a final revolt. The protestors against the Union maintained the illegality of it, and claimed to be the legal church. They carried their claim to the House of Lords, and it was upheld. The decision of the Lords was based on the Standards of the Church and the explicit statements of its founders, and it affirmed the principle that the property of a church must go with its standards. If the standards are immovable doctrinally, the property is immovable accordingly. But if the standards are transient the property follows them. That surely is sound law. That it has brought an inequity is owing to the dogmatic action of the Free Church in 1843. The Lords did nothing more than show the church its own fetters unconsciously made permanent, and to lay upon it the disaster involved in its own dogmatism.

The beaten sect has taken its defeat badly. It has railed on the judges and scoffed at the victors. It has endeavoured to explain away its Declaratory Acts, and to prove that it has always had the power to alter its standards. It has kept its palm conveniently in its own prosecution of those who moved for alteration. And now, after all its recriminations, and its murmurings about spiritual independence, it is projecting a new constitution which is to give it leave to alter or modify its standards as it may think fit. The proposal admits the hard-and fast nature of the old Constitution, and the justice of the Lords' decision.

The United Free Church is in a sad dilemma. It knows that it is neither united nor free. It has standards which it cannot now hold, as heretofore understood, but which it dare not put entirely aside; and though it knows the Bible is in the hands of the higher critics, it has to make a discreet retreat upon it. It is making a pathetic appeal to the young of its fold, and vaguely promising development.

There are many in Scotland to-day who are bitterly regretting that their Free Church did not honestly and frankly own its initial error, and courageously declare for proper freedom. Now, when its stock of derision of the law, and its flow of rage at its rival are spent, it has become aware that it requires a new Constitution. Principal Rainy, with transparent diplomacy, attempts to cover up the humiliating state of the Church. He pretends that the proposed new Constitution is but the old freshly presented; that the Church is unchanged. The pretence could hardly have deceived the Assembly though it was willing to imagine itself unaltered. If it be not changed by these sixty-two years of experience, it has the greater fault. If it be changed, and seeks to hide the change, its artifice is unbecoming. Meanwhile the situation becomes more complicated. The Established Church, viewing the movements of the litigants, seizes the occasion for the purpose of reducing the galling pressure of the Confession of Faith. The spectacle is marvellous. With the old Confession in its trembling hands, the Kirk implores Parliament to give it leave to sink it out of sight in Lethe. It is a dead thing, and it must be laid by without hope of resurrection. Along with it in the House of Commons the other sections of Scotch Presbyterians stand, asking the House to mediate between them with regard to property. A notable trio as they appear there imploringly! Parliament is awkwardly placed in the matter. It cannot act without criticising the Lords' judgment and interfering with their decision. It might well say "Who made me a judge and divider among you?" If it grants the request of the Established Church, and allows the liberty of subscription desired, it will introduce a new principle into Scottish ecclesiasticism which will have far-reaching effects. Hitherto, the Standards have been held on the principle of permanence; but if the desired liberty be given, they will in future be held on the principle of temporariness. The Church in that case will virtually be creedless: it may make a new profession every year. The request of the Church virtually means the disestablishment of the Confession of Faith and the Catechisms. Thereby, a revolution is signified. The U.F. Church, seeing that a Church established by law, but permitted to change its creed as it pleases, would have a tremendous advantage over every other, is seeking, within its own borders, the power to change also, so that if these two leading bodies are set free to alter their doctrinal bond, we will have a new spirit and a new life in Scotland.

The one striking thing already evident in the commotion is that the profession of faith in Calvinism in Scotland is confined to the legal Free Church. Belief in Calvinism is now a Celtic peculiarity, a survival of Highland superstition. It seeks refuge from the Higher Criticism in the wilds of Ross and Caithness; it asks the covert of Tartan, the flavour of peatreek, and the brogue of Gaelic.

The Act of Uniformity has proved to be the Act of Unanimity. The attempt to weld a nation dogmatically has failed. Calvinism in Scotland spells Constriction. The object-lesson is one of the most complete and instructive of modern times. It is a terrible exposure of the devitalising influences of dogmatism, the folly of close theological trusts, and the mischief of egotistic denominationalism. It is at the same time a complete justification of the open-minded progressive attitude of a creedless Church, and of the position of those who hold that the natural seat of authority in religion is in the living conscience, and not in any ancient writing. Every truly free body of religionists may well rejoice at the disintegration of dogmatism in Scotland, and at the tendency towards legitimate liberty of thought, while wishing that the dissolving forces were more graciously met, and the enthusiasm for progress were more intense. In the day of its declared emancipation, Scottish theology may not take a name bearing the marks of controversy; but whatever the title of the new Church may be, it will indicate a preference for real spiritual freedom, and an opportunity for comprehension of a thoroughly inclusive character.

HEART-WORSHIP, not head-worship, makes a man's religion. Devotion to an ideal is worship; the higher the ideal the nobler the worship. By devotion to our highest ideal we expand our minds to embrace what is still higher. By devotion to self we quench idealism and become base. —F. W. Newman.

To souls baptized in Christian nobleness the largest sphere of command is but a wider empire of obedience, calling them, not into escape from holy rule, but to its full impersonation. Only now that no outer rule is given them by another, and they have nothing to copy with painful imitation, have they to bring forth the interpretation from within, and set themselves at one with the will of God by a heart of self-renunciation—a love that seizes all divine ends, and in expressing itself realises them. In short, power is never felt as power, except by those who abuse it. Like other things that awaken desire at a distance, no sooner is it entered, than it is found to be not more triumphant happiness, but deeper life; utterly disappointing to him who wants more for himself; ennobling to him who can dispense and administer for God.—James Martineau.

TWO CENTENARIES.

JAMES MARTINEAU AND FRANCIS NEWMAN AS RELIGIOUS TEACHERS.

BY THE REV. SYDNEY H. MELLONE, M.A., D.Sc.

DR. MELLONE'S address on this subject was given at the Thursday morning Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week. The morning began with a devotional service, conducted by the Rev. A. W. Fox, who gave a helpful address on "The Duty and Value of Prayer." At the subsequent Conference the chair was taken by the President, the Right Hon. William Kenrick. Dr. Mellone's address, we understand, is likely to be separately published by the Association, and we must therefore only give some passages from it here.

Having referred to the warm and intimate friendship which united the two teachers born in the same year, Martineau on April 21, Newman on June 27, 1805—a friendship unbroken by divergence of their views on some vital subjects, Dr. Mellone gave a brief exposition of the essential meaning of Religion, depending as it does on direct personal experience, and then passed to an account of Martineau's and Newman's teaching on the subject.

Martineau's Central Idea.

"God, to be known, must be experienced, and were there nowhere any experience of God, there could be no knowledge of Him. We affirm that this is the real basis of religious belief, which is always an attempt to interpret some kind of experience of God. If asked why a large part of the human race would disown any experience of the kind, we answer again, because all our faculties, from the lowest to the highest, are things of degree, are more or less developed, more or less intense. This, I think, explains and justifies Martineau's central idea of what Religion really is. Religion is a fact of human life. What makes this fact possible? The answer to this question lies in a fundamental thought which Martineau held consistently all his life: the Universal Incarnation. Repeatedly he uses that phrase. I select the following as typical of many different expressions which he gave to the thought: 'The Incarnation is true, not of Christ exclusively, but of Man universally, and of God everlastingly. He bends into the human, to dwell there; and humanity is the susceptible organ of the Divine. And the spiritual light in us which forms our higher life is of one substance with His own Righteousness—its manifestation, with unaltered essence and authority, in the theatre of our nature. Of this grand and universal truth Christ became the revealer, not by being an exceptional personage (who could be a rule for nothing), but by being a signal instance of it so intense and impressive as to set fire to every veil that would longer hide it.' (Life, vol. i. p. 396.) In virtue of this living union between God and Man we maintain 'the strictly divine and inspired character of our own highest desires and best affections,' which are part of the very Being of God—His perpetual self-revelation to us. (Life, vol. ii. p. 304; Carpenter, pp. 313, 314.) That is why Religion is possible. And what is Religion, then? Religion begins when our highest springs of action begin to be experienced as Divine: when something ideal, something that at first seems only a dream of future possibility, becomes more than this, and brings us into touch with a Real Presence, higher still, ready to strengthen us as we try to make the ideal a part of ourself."

The Teaching of Newman's "Soul."

"The real value of Newman's book on 'The Soul' is that in it he sets forth, with remarkable simplicity and force, the same experiential view of Religion. What he there says concerning the relationship between God and Man is based directly on his experience; and I believe that Mr. Upton is abundantly justified in saying that 'in some respects the book is likely to be better understood and appreciated now than it was when it first appeared; for in the present day it is increasingly seen that the knowledge of God is chiefly an immediate and not an inferential knowledge, and that if we are to find Him effectually we must seek Him in the present facts of the actual personal life.' ("The Soul," Popular ed., p. 20.) This is in entire harmony with the declaration deliberately made by Martineau: 'I have never regarded what is called religious philosophy as anything but the attempt of the human mind to construe to itself as best it can the Divine Facts and Realities which in any case enter the conscious life of humanity.' With Martineau, Newman defines Religion as experience of personal communion with the Eternal; with Martineau, he bases on this a conception of the indivisible union of the human spirit with Him, of whose Being indeed it partakes. . . . . The religious sense, says Newman, implies its object just as our feeling of the material world does; the correspondence is complete, and the right to trust the sense of God is stronger because it is so much the deeper of the two. He points out that the capacity for the religious sense may be dormant and undeveloped; and in an eloquent passage he shows that, when active, it needs to be balanced by a power of thought adequate, as we have said, to interpret the experience that it gives."

Dr. Mellone then went on to speak of certain differences in the teaching of Martineau and Newman. Only one other passage, on a matter of great importance, can be given here.

The Once- and Twice-Born.

"What we have before us are two kinds of mental growth. It is, or ought to be, a commonplace to say that our minds are always developing, always growing. There are some whose mental development is a gradual, rational process of growth, harmoniously responding to favourable outward conditions: here are no definite 'transition-points' from one thing to something conspicuously different. There are others so constituted that their mental development can only proceed by crises, with storm and stress and struggle. The same kind of religious doctrine cannot appeal to both of these two kinds of men. Francis Newman himself was one of the twice-born. I remember, when I first read his book, 'The Soul,' the surprise with which I found the author—whom I had heard of only as a pure Theist, a severe critic of historical Christianity—expounding a religion of the purest evangelical type, though in a non-Christian setting! This fact of itself is sufficient to show how superficial are some of the distinctions that we make, and how absurd it is to suppose that all ideas of conversion, regeneration, and the like are a set of delusions propagated by the campaigns of such men as Torrey. Newman gives a just account of what conversion is, and of the causes which lead to it (pp. 170 ff.); and he deliberately declares that essential religion is the experience of Paul (p. 334), though he regards the historical Christ as of no true religious importance. It is therefore not surprising when we find him declaring that the twice-born temperament beyond a doubt 'has the higher order of religion' (pp. 204–5). This is certainly a great mistake. If ever there was a case where neither of two things is higher or lower than the other, it is here. And perfection can only be approached when each type of experience becomes capable of appreciating, and then assimilating the special excellences of the other; and this is accomplished not by logic but by life. In the meantime, no one type of religious doctrine can be found which will appeal effectively to both these classes; if anyone doubts this, let him find it."

Conclusion.

"As a concluding word let me recur to the thought which is Martineau's great and lasting contribution to theology to-day: the self-revealing Presence of God in all souls. I know that such a thought is not likely to become an 'idol of the market-place.' Is it then only a fair dream dreamt by those who know not the realities of the world? Let a city crowd of random persons gather; and look at them, are they a revelation of God? Here we touch the bottom of the whole matter. To entertain these doubts is the only real atheism that exists—an atheism too deep for argument pro and con. This doubt is resolved only by life. Choose to be a man, and live as a man and you will find it possible to believe in men, not for what they are, but for what they have it in them to become; and, first believing thus in man, you will find life and experience teaching belief in God. Choose not to be a man, choose to be an animal, and assuredly your faith will adapt itself to your life. I know that these low estimates of life come not only from those whose lives are low. To any jaded and unquickened eye life may seem dead and common, pure vulgarism, flatness, and disgust. But I answer in the words of one of the finest teachers of our day: 'This world never did anywhere or at any time contain more of essential divinity, or of eternal meaning, than is embodied in what is seen every day. There is life; and there, a step away, is death. There is the only kind of beauty there ever was. There is the old human struggle and its fruits together. There is the text and the sermon, the real and the ideal in one. Of the fibre of which these things consist is the material woven of all the griefs, joys, and finest meanings that ever were, or ever shall be, in this world.'"

FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN.

THE centenary of the birth of FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN, which falls on Tuesday next, June 27, has been happily marked by the re-issue, both as a bound volume and in the popular sixpenny edition, of his best-known book on "The Soul,"* and also by the address given by Dr. MELLONE at Essex Hall last week, on the Two Centenaries, of MARTINEAU and NEWMAN, of which some account will be found in our present issue.

The new edition of "The Soul" is brought out with a brief memoir of the author, and an introduction, by Professor UPTON. It is printed in admirably clear and readable type, a great improvement on the earlier cheap edition of some twenty-five years ago; but what is given as the preface to the third edition is the chapter of "Introductory Remarks," which NEWMAN wrote in 1852 and submitted to MARTINEAU'S criticism before it was published. "The Soul" was first published in 1849, and in February of the following year MARTINEAU wrote to his friend: "Now I have read 'The Soul,' and shall bless you for it, with thanks I cannot speak, so long as I have a soul that lives. Nothing that I have ever read—unless some scattered thoughts of PASCAL'S—has come so close to me, and so strengthened a deep but too shrinking faith." Again in 1852, in sending a long and valuable letter of comment on the "Introductory Remarks" he wrote: "I am truly rejoiced to hear of the projected new edition of 'The Soul.' It is one of the two or three books that I love with a feeling of measureless gratitude, and that stand off, at long intervals in my memory, as milestones, marking great stages in my spiritual life." The points on which MARTINEAU and NEWMAN differed are noted in Professor UPTON'S introduction, and the main purpose of the book is clearly indicated: "to give adequate utterance to the author's deep conviction of the reality and profound significance of conscious communion between the individual soul and GOD." On this point we may refer our readers also to the account of Dr. MELLONE'S address in another column: and we trust that very many will turn to the book itself, and be led to an earnest consideration of the chapters on the sense of the Infinite within us, the sense of Sin and of Personal Relation to GOD, and on Spiritual Progress. It is by this book and his later work on "Hebrew Theism" that NEWMAN will be longest remembered. From the latter we append an extract here. Of this book, published in its earliest form simply as "Theism" in 1858, MARTINEAU wrote to NEWMAN: "How rich it is in such wisdom as only a faithful and loving and variously experienced mind can attain, I already see; and from the rare power which your words always have upon me — as among the few living utterances on spiritual things left to us in these days—I know what is in store for my quiet hours in what remains at present unread. To some of the pieces a sympathetic feeling made me fly at once, and in the lines on 'God as Conscience' I find one of the most powerful statements imaginable of an argument destined, I am convinced, to carry with it ere long every noble-minded and thoughtful doubter. There is no greater work to be done in this age, I do believe, than that in which you and Miss COBBE are rendering foremost service—the carrying home of the simplest and highest faiths into their last seats in human nature, and fetching out at once their justification and their meaning thence."

Those are the essential things in FRANCIS NEWMAN, and in commemorating his centenary we attempt here no further study of his life and work. His high scholarship, the variety of his works, the uncompromising faithfulness of his social pleadings, are well known. "Your thoughts on men and things," wrote MARTINEAU in 1871, "always touch and move me, like a prophet's words." There are still one or two left who remember with gratitude his teaching as Classical Professor in Manchester College, at Manchester, and more, including Mr. UPTON, who with a like feeling recall his Latin lectures in University College, London. His abiding teaching of what is at the heart of vital religion is in those two books we have named:

* "The Soul, Its Sorrows and Its Aspirations. An Essay towards the Natural History of the Soul as the true basis of Theology." By Francis William Newman, formerly Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. With Memoir and Introduction by Charles B. Upton, B.A., B.Sc., Emeritus Professor of Philosophy in Manchester College, Oxford. (London: Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand. 2s. 6d. net. CALL TO GOD'S SERVICE.

BY F. W. NEWMAN.

CONSECRATE yourselves to God, all ye youths and maidens!
Ere the world benumb your fresh feeling or sin harden your conscience.
Know that others have found God, as ye have not yet found Him;
But seek ye after Him, and ye shall find Him also:
Delight yourselves in Him, and He shall give you the desire of your hearts.
Seek Him in the open field or in the shrouded wood,
Under the evening sky, or in the solitary chamber.
Take with you words, and turn to Him, and say:
"Oh, Author of our spirits, Protector of our souls,
With thee strength dwelleth in repose, and no passions are in discord;
But the passions of youth are untamed, and we do but move toward perfection,
And Desire often seduces from Goodness, or Ease deters from Duty.
Yet wisely were we made by Thee, and thy Will must be best for us;
Early to submit were our prudence, and sweetly to obey, our happiness;
And when we know that we seek thy will, we know that we become thy servants.
Lo! here we resign all baser desire, we consecrate ourselves to be thine.
We will struggle to be as Thou approvest; to be pure, as Thou art pure,
Unwarped by perverse passion, unspoiled by selfishness,
Active for every good work, sympathising with every good cause,
Haters and scorners of the wrong, lovers of good and of good men.
So will we aspire to Thee, that we may be thine now and alway.
To live before thy open eye, and to die into thy secret bosom."
Speak to Him thus, or to this effect, knowing that He reads all your heart;
Knowing that his light searches your dark corners, and sees your unknown faults.
Fear not to meet his piercing gaze, shrink not from his eyes of flame,
But stand before them true-heartedly, to let them burn up your sin.
Oh, how will it cleanse your conscience and strengthen your best purposes!
How will it put to shame all unkindness, all impurity, all worldliness and pride?
Ye who admire heroism shall grow heroic, and the compassionate more tender,
And the generous more self-sacrificing, and the prudent more self-possessed,
Every virtue shall be strengthened, and every vice shall be crippled,
From the day that ye solemnly consecrate your all to the ever-present God.
For every impulse shall fall into its own place, and learn its due subordination,
And become the meek minister of the soul, or the pleasant amuser of its weariness,
The strong combatant for the right, or the sharp hunter after the true.
And your natures shall become enlarged, as they expand toward God:
Your insight shall be deeper, and your survey broader,
Your selfishness shall become prudence, and your prudence unselfishness,

Loving your neighbours, loving your country, and mankind, and the Right.
When the faithless stumble at truth, your faith shall but grow stronger,
And where the hypocrite is feeble, your sound heart shall be mighty.
Only aspire after perfection, and tell this out to God,
And ere long ye shall find Him, and know his exceeding great joy.
He shall fill you of his own fulness and visit you with his Spirit,
And He shall be your trusted Lord, and ye shall be his conscious servants,
Equipped for life and careless of death, aspiring after eternity,
Sighing over your own unworthiness, yet certain of Almighty Love.

PROTAB CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR.

ON Thursday, Jan. 19, the venerable Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, who, after the Rajah Rammohun Roy, is honoured as the patriarch of Brahmo Samaj of India, passed away. We have now to record the death, on Saturday, May 27, of another leader, Protab Chunder Mozoomdar, the relative and devoted follower of Keshub Chunder Sen. Mr. Mozoomdar, who was in his sixty-fifth year, had been for many months in a condition of great feebleness. The following letter received by Mr. Ion Pritchard tells of the peaceful ending of his life.

DEAR SIR,—Rev. P. C. Mozoomdar passed away on Saturday last, the 27th inst., at 2.27 p.m. For the last week he was almost wholly speechless, although there was not much acute pain, at least not much that there was an outward expression of, while consciousness seemed to be clear within, and there was a resigned tranquillity upon the face which spoke of the inner peace and rest, and at last when the call came, he fell quietly asleep. I feel I owe it to you to write this separate note for communication, along with our most grateful acknowledgments, to those who contributed so generously towards giving as much relief and comfort as brotherly help and sympathy could give during the last days of his illness.—Yours sincerely, B. N. SEN.

41, Machnabazar-street, Calcutta,
May 30, 1905.

Mr. Mozoomdar was born in Oct., 1840, in a village some 24 miles north of Calcutta. His father died when he was a boy of nine, his mother when he was not yet eighteen. They were at that time living in Calcutta, and he was a student in the Presidency College. In 1858, the year of his mother's death, he married, and in the following year, having grown up strongly under the influence of Keshub, he formally joined the Brahmo Samaj. Through inward and outward trials he patiently pursued his course, and became known as an eloquent preacher and leader of the Theistic movement in India. In 1870 he became editor of the Indian Mirror, a paper established by the Sen family, and in 1874 he was for the first time in England. On his second visit in 1883 he returned home by way of America and Japan, to find, on his return, that Keshub Chunder Sen had passed away.

While he was in America, Mr. Mozoomdar's striking book "The Oriental Christ," was published (Boston: G. H. Ellis, 1883), in which he gives a touching account of how in his lonely struggles as a young man the thought of Christ took hold of him, and became a personal, consecrating, helpful presence in his life. Ten years later (September, 1893) he attended the great Parliament of Religions in Chicago, and not only spoke at the opening and closing sessions, but contributed two papers, on the Brahmo Samaj, and on "The World's Religious Debt to Asia." In that year Ellis, of Boston, published two of his devotional books, "Heart Beats" and "The Spirit of God," the former with a biographical sketch of the author by S. J. Barrows. A later devotional book is his "Silent Pastor." Some examples of Mr. Mozoomdar's devotional writings, with further notice of his teaching, we hope to publish next week.

In 1900 he was for the last time in this country, coming here from America, where he had attended the Unitarian anniversary meetings in Boston. He gave an address at the Imperial Institute in July on "Present-Day Progress in India," Lord Northbrook presiding, and preached several times in our churches, both in England and Scotland. In October he gave an address at the Council meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

To the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at the Amsterdam meeting in 1903, Mr. Mozoomdar sent a letter on "The Message of Liberal Thought." "To me, brethren," he wrote, "the message of liberal thought is the message of inward soul-religion, which emancipates and spiritualises all things it touches." That letter was written from his summer home at Kurseong, high up in the Eastern Himalayas, where he spent several months every year in solitary meditation. He had also a house in Calcutta, "Peace Cottage," which he had built in 1878. There it was he died.

A mystic, an eloquent exponent of the things of the Spirit, his memory will be reverenced not only by his brethren of the Brahmo Samaj in India, but by many friends in this country, who recognise in him not indeed a great leader, like Keshub, but yet a man of prophetic gifts, earnestly devoted to the same high service.

THE second number of the University Review (Sherratt & Hughes, 6d. net), the June number, has for frontispiece a reproduction of Watts's portrait of Dr. Martineau. The first article is on "University Settlements," by Canon Barnett.

THE first of the six Sunday morning services, which Dr. John Hunter has undertaken to conduct in the Bechstein Hall, was attended last Sunday by a congregation of some 400 people. An American organ was used, and Mr. Robert Cameron, M.P., read the lessons. The subject of the sermon was "The Decay of Reverence," and it was an impassioned appeal for the recognition of the sacredness of human life and the Divine presence in all things.

THE ASSOCIATION CONFERENCE.

THE DECLINE OF PUBLIC WORSHIP CAUSES AND REMEDIES.

By THE REV. F. K. FREESTON.

IT is surely as suggestive, as it is fitting, that the subject for our consideration should have been preceded by a disquisition on James Martineau and Francis Newman. Dr. Martineau throughout his life attached the utmost import to public worship: he greatly enriched its prayer and praise by his two liturgical services and his three collections of hymns; he claimed for it, from the pulpit particularly, both spiritual reality and intellectual sincerity; and he found in the devoutly worshipping congregation both the finest fruits of religion and the truest bonds of church union. Newman, on the other hand, felt little need for the church's aid, distrusted its proffered means of grace, condemned liturgies as mere puerilities, and seems to have inwardly groaned under almost every sermon he heard! Both sides are thus set before us through such eminent representatives.

The subject I have been asked to introduce is intended for you to discuss, not for me to prejudge. In one sense it is as old as the hills, but in another it has a modern phase which has dictated its specific terms. The decline of public worship means—not the decline of the spirit of worship in itself, but the decline of the habit of common worship at a set time and place. It contains the implication that this habit is now decreasing.

For the purpose of this discussion we may take that implication as an admission. Religion and church attendance are, of course, not synonymous; a newspaper census is a needless and perhaps impertinent performance; statistics cannot gauge spiritual matters, but yet they may confirm, as they have done, a previous opinion that, if there has not been an actual decline, there has yet been a relative one to the increasing population. And, if we narrow our inquiries to the Free Trust Churches chiefly attended by Unitarians, we must confess, without staying to note exceptions, that the signs of declension are only too obvious. It is not only a case of figures but of families. Fathers and mothers bearing honoured names, inheriting noble traditions, pass to their rest, but the sons and daughters do not always fill their pews. Regular worshippers tend to grow irregular, the "twicers" to become "oncers," with the glorious exceptions of a few splendid stalwarts who are the very salt of the churches, and always in their places. The week-end absentee who used to occasionally go to the country, or the sea, now inclines to reverse the process and occasionally come to church. Sunday cycling, Sunday golf, Sunday tennis, Sunday on the river, may now be indulged in galore by everybody except the minister! Other reasons adduced for absence make up an ever-extending list, and are held, I find, to be so valid, that you must not say a word. Weather, distance, trains, visitors, correspondence: 'do belong and sometimes come,' 'subscribe so need not come,' 'don't go anywhere else,' 'was at church last week'; the organ too loud, the singing too bad, the sermon too long, the church too warm; there is a liturgy, there is no liturgy; too late to start, too lazy to turn out; such are but samples of which there is plenty of choice, and there are many who choose. But not many, if any, of these can be dignified as direct causes of decreased attendance; they are the surface signs of deeper ills. Some are temporary reasons which merit replies, whilst others surely are but excuses only redeemed by their frankness. Yet we must realise that the attitude of the churches towards these reasons has undergone a very marked change. No longer may they hurl upon the Sabbath-breaker and church deserter the old rebukes and threats which once scolded him back to better ways. No there has been a change, it is clear, and we have not yet reached the heart of the matter. The true causes lie deeper. Attendance at public worship has passed through four stages. Once it was compulsory on pain of penalty; the defaulting Puritan was fined twelve pence for each absence, and put into the stocks by the church doors until he had paid his dues. (I recommend this means of raising funds in place of bazaars.) Next it was held necessary as a theological superstition, and an essential means of salvation; then it became customary as a generally observed and expected Sunday duty; and lastly it has became quite voluntary—but with an interpretation chiefly as the right to stay away. The fear motive and the duty motive have in turn lost their hold. "I must, I ought, I will" have now given way to "I may or may not—and probably shall not."

Now if it be contended that this is all to the bad, I cannot agree; for if it means that those who go to service go because they genuinely wish, then although they be fewer in number, the tone of public worship is healthier, more sincere, and more promising for the future. At present, however, we are struck chiefly with the sincerity of the absentee—the sincerity which makes a merit of staying away, which savours of intellectual superiority, and which considers attendance, if not in the mood on Sunday, a distinct act of hypocrisy. The puritanical reason, the theological reason, the sabbatarian reason, the conventional reason, are all going, or gone; so far as they remain, they are hindrances to the man who, if he goes to worship ever, must go from an entirely other, and higher, desire.

Now we are coming to closer quarters with our question. Why do not these emancipated worshippers attend the churches in larger numbers? Is it the fault of the churches, or themselves, or is it due to an altogether different set of circumstances arising from modern conditions? We shall find, I think, that all three have to do with the case.

Is not the situation something like this? The man who has cut his old moorings away is adrift on an unfamiliar sea. Orthodoxy, in the true meaning of the phrase, has lost its force and guidance. He is left to his own devices and has neither chart nor compass. He finds himself, I mean, in a time of doctrinal disintegration, of theological transition, and of consequent indefinite and uncertain conviction. He is not quite sure where he stands, or for what the churches stand. Their emphasis seems passing over dogma to something other; but as to its nature and future he is not yet clear. The note of authority, of certainty, once so distinct, is now faint—faint in the church, so he does not hear it; faint in his heart, so he does not go to worship. He looks for it now elsewhere—in nature, in the unchurched interests and fellowships of art and literature, in the halls of ethical societies, and the titles of Sunday lectures. He finds that religion is not only a matter for a church interior; nay, that sometimes, as in Germany, it seems to thrive better without its care; he knows that theological questions no longer need a preacher, but are treated with greater fulness and interest in books, reviews, the daily press, and even the Sunday papers. Hence, the church no longer speaks with authority, neither seems in any way necessary. So he stays away. I submit, then, that this time of transition towards a new reconstruction, this phase of floundering conviction in religion, is largely, and perhaps chiefly, the cause of the decrease of church attendance. But it is also a cause of promise.

Is not a second cause the multiplicity of interests which marks so conspicuously and so increasingly the life of to-day? Time was when the church or chapel with its school was the one centre of interest in the place. It provided the fellowships and friendships, the lectures, classes, and entertainments, the plays and the concerts, the activities and the philanthropics, which not only brought and kept the church-goers together, but were not to be found elsewhere. Now the church has to take its chance amongst a crowd of other concerns. Better lectures, better music, better drama are provided elsewhere; theatres have sprung up like mushrooms in a night; amusements and entertainments of a more alluring and less simple nature make the penny reading in the schoolroom a very poor and tame affair. Hence the church bond, on its social and institutional side, which brings the people together in the week less frequently and less whole-heartedly, holds them also more loosely on the Sunday.

And this multiplicity tells adversely in another way. Time was when life's interests, if narrower, were yet more thorough. If our fathers knew less they knew that less better; if they had fewer books, they mastered them, and lived on them, whereas we just dip and glance, and skip and taste, rather than mark, learn, and inwardly digest. There was more leisured concentration, more quiet pondering on the few great questions of life and religion. And this quiet of habit and thought was the right preparation for worship. Now men have cast that old quiet away in the din of many voices, and the distractions of many cares. No longer arrested seriously by the issues of eternity, they are caught up by the latest novelty, require to be attracted, as they say, crave the sensational rather than the spiritual. and are carried round and round in the whirlpool, or rushed from thing to thing, from place to place, dissipating their energies over a wide surface of smaller issues instead of concentrating them on the great things, or letting the great things concentrate themselves, so that we may feed this mind of ours "in a wise passiveness." Matthew Arnold's complaint is truer now than when he uttered it:

> What shelter to grow ripe is ours?
> What leisure to grow wise?
> . . . . . .
> Too fast we live, too much are tried
> Too harassed to attain
> The thoughtful calm of spiritual understanding.

This leisureless restlessness towards the things of the spirit must tell against public worship, which has no novelty with which to attract; but can only go on appealing to the old yearning in the soul of man which has been from the beginning. In addition to these general causes there are special ones affecting the so-called Unitarian churches. Time forbids any dwelling upon them, but will you permit me the effrontery to suggest three of them, one affecting their church position, a second their method, and a third their children.

The cohesion of common opinion which once held together the congregation can no longer be relied on. So long as the Unitarian protest was a plainly needed task it gave a very definite note to the theological movement, and made men join in earnest on its behalf. This protest acted in two ways. It brought them out of other churches, and it brought them into ours; converts were added in numbers, and they flourished. But thought has advanced, the old protest is needed less and less, though still necessary in occasional cases. Unitarians have widened their views, Trinitarians are revising their creeds; doctrinal differences do not count for as much; men feel far less call to change their church, theological converts are less numerous, with these twin results, that Unitarians in Free Trust Churches feel it less necessary to make the church their means of testimony each Sunday, and Unitarians in other churches feel it equally less necessary to come out of their sanctuary, and openly join the enemy. This means, surely, that opinion in theology is losing its once cohesive quality; it means that Unitarianism will remain and act as a distinctive school of thought, but will rightfully cease to act as a church-basis for worship.

A second cause of decrease is the one-man monopoly of the service. We still compel the people to too much reticence, too little speech. The minister does everything; the laity listen and then go home and criticise the sermon. They do not read the lessons, or offer prayers, or ever have the chance to speak five words in the church, or take any personal, responsible share in the service whatsoever. It will be said that this also obtains in other Nonconformist churches; truly, but in a less degree. It will be said that this custom always has been; yes, but are we not more resenting in this later sacerdotal time the professional element in religion? It will be said again that it is the good minister that makes the good congregation, and this, I suppose is true in the main; but I know more than one exception who has not yet received this consolation, and I believe we are impoverishing our worshipping vitality through this religion by proxy, this reticence of the laity, in that they are not given sufficient spiritual responsibility.

We trust too much to the pulpit alone to bring the congregation, and perhaps instance the success of Spurgeon. But Spurgeon said always, and often, "It was my congregation that brought my congregation."

A third cause especially affecting us is, I am convinced, parental slackness. Whatever may or may not happen in other churches, a curious, specious superstition partly prevails in ours that to accustom our children to come with us to service is to be guilty of bias, to expect too much, and to make worship a weariness of the flesh. That seems to me both false theory and slack responsibility. If we elders believe in worship ourselves, we must believe in it also for all who belong to us; we must frankly and deliberately, and in their future interest, set this bias towards the service; we must treat the Sunday church going as a holy custom, not to be broken by any random inclination. They may not, and indeed need not, when quite young understand the whole service; they must not when older be compelled too far; but if the parents themselves lead the way to church, the family pew with its irregular row of heads need not be a dreaded prison-house; but instead a true forecourt to the temple not made with hands. Is not the lightness with which public worship is neglected or discarded often to be traced to the absence of these early habits and holy memories?

Do we need then to say much about remedies? Remedy is a strong word; it implies an entire cure for the disease, and he were a bold man indeed who should undertake to prescribe a complete specific for the neglect of public worship. But the attempt to indicate causes has at the same time, of course, hinted at restoratives.

In conclusion, therefore, I will only refer briefly and tentatively to some of the means that have been suggested previously, or have suggested themselves to-day..

The remedies suggested as the result of the Daily News census were these: (1) Better preaching; granted. (2) Commodious halls, instead of ecclesiastical edifices; questioned. (3) Institutional churches; perhaps. (4) A whole gospel; agreed. (5) Open-air services; in certain cases. Forgive the comments; they are not to commit your opinion, but save your time.

The way of remedy must lie, one feels, both above and below the Daily News proposals. Before we alter methods, we must revise our ideas.

The worship motive has changed, and partly lost its hold. Our first task is to put a higher motive in its place, and hope to bring back its force. Worship has been enjoined as a means to an end; we have to make it the end itself. It has been recommended as a prudential, spiritual advantage; we have to reveal it as something natural and spontaneous, an instinct of the heart, an inherent necessity of the spirit. It has been made to consist too much of individual petition and personal consideration; it is really quite an opposite thing, a free offering of ourselves to the Father of all spirits, and also, therefore, of ourselves to each other, or rather of ourselves together, so that the thought of self is merged in the consciousness of all the rest. This is its primal essence; it is the consummation of brotherliness, not for a purpose, but from a wish; it is the realisation of the universal incarnation. It rests, therefore, on a foundation fact of human nature: we should be drawn to it, not from the thought of what we can get, not from any private want, but from the longing to share this common emotion, common praying, common thanksgiving, common association. For the greatest truths of religion, as of character, are only understood as they truly are, when they are thus realised together in a magnetic, sympathetic atmosphere and at a certain spiritual temperature. A solitary religion is an almost impossible thing; public worship is the very finest of fellowship. But we have not risen to this fact as yet ourselves, and hence we have not stirred it into glad consciousness in others.

We must inculcate therefore a truer church idea. We individualists in doctrine and independents in organisation need a keener, larger conception of the church as an institution, as a means, and the best means, of realising the higher truths and sympathies of religion. The Institutional Church must be the product of, not the substitute for, the worshipful church. Institutional religion has its perils, but also its great appeals, and we need to believe more fully in what the church can do and be; we lack, do we not, that glad sense of inclusion, that kindling inspiration, that contagious feeling which so unite and uplift those who look to the Church Militant, if not yet the Church Triumphant. When churchmen sing with such swing and conviction "The Church's one foundation," they ignite a glowing emotion which is practically unknown in our communion—an all-embracing, self-forgetting conception of their place and oneness in the universal church. Because that idea is linked with claims we cannot recognise, are we therefore wise to cast to the winds all claims, whether true or false? I know that we respond to the ideal of the Church Invisible when we sing Samuel Longfellow's glorious hymn. I know that we respond to the Church Universal when we read Channing's famous discourse, "I belong to the Universal Church: nothing can separate me from it." But we do not bring down that high emotion into the church visible and local which, if freed from all exclusiveness and based on universal trusts, may be not only the present realisation in part of the one Church Catholic; but also the most effective means of accomplishing its fulfilment. Churches will not hold the people, if they are concerned with anything less than the universal. The church idea has still to possess us more with all its wealth and power.

And if we are to know the fulness of these universal things, must we not, in the third place, greatly enrich our ordinary church services? We make our public worship too ordinary a concern; we jealously keep it too plain and uniform; we bereave it of simple rite and ceremoney through needless dread of a fancied insincerity; we stint it of historical association and symbolical suggestion, that we may escape the snares of ritualism. But we are too little in touch with our Christian inheritance, too much in bondage to rationalistic fears. In cold adherence to a lofty, but very chilly theory, we have tried to dispense with the precious church associations which mean so much to others. We are still held back by the Puritan revolt. The simplicity of early Christian rites, the irresistible entreaty of ancient prayer and liturgy, the spiritual treasury of Christian history, the holy comradeship of mystic and saint, the wealth of religious music and art, the cathedral chant, the cloister quiet—these and such rich associations with the past have had for us little ennobling or compelling force, have found little or no place either in our Christian devotions or church buildings. We have consequently lived on in an isolation, partly enforced, but partly self-chosen, making a merit of our fault and expecting to nourish upon it a rich, poetic, cultured, religious life. Our services of devotion need much more loving attention, more beauty and harmony, more consecutiveness and consistency; our church members need to realise the sacred significance of church membership; our young people need to be welcomed into the church with a special but simple service; and our church buildings, wherever there are the requisite means, should have some helpful architectural beauties and not be replaced by commodious halls!

If only we can feel the lift of a larger life we shall modify our methods in due course: shorter services but richer, earlier services in summer, liturgy and free prayer, less preaching but better, and the sermon not a distinct and separate part but woven in with the devotion, more harmony of hymn and tune: these and other modifications may be left to formulate themselves. The point is that we cannot do without the very best within our reach.

For are we not brought, in fine, to this conclusion? The man who can no longer rest on the authority of either the church, or the past, is left alone with the doctrine of direct and present intuition. It is a terrible mistake to imagine that the modern man can stand thus entirely alone with this high, soul-searching doctrine, and dispense with all the aids of religion. A Francis Newman can, but who else is sufficient without some help. That help is public worship—common prayer and praise with one's fellows in a church. Therefore we must expect more from our churches; not less. We must not cheapen our position, not lower our idea, not expect to attract people by social devices or sensational advertisements, not rush after the popular preacher; but each of us, whether layman or minister, bring our own spiritual ardour to bear in just the place where we are. And even as this church decline is a phase in a transition time, so that phase will pass and that transition lead to a reconstruction wherein the coming church will come by its own again. Then the lonely wanderer will return, and like the Ancient Mariner will exclaim:—

> O wedding guest! this soul hath been
> Alone on a wide, wide sea:
> So lonely 'twas, that God Himself
> Scarce seemed there to be.
> But sweeter than the marriage feast,
> 'Tis sweeter far to me
> To walk together to the kirk
> With a goodly company.
> To walk together to the kirk,
> And all together pray,
> While each to his great Father bends—
> Old men, and babes, and loving friends
> And youths and maidens gay!

This paper was read at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall, on Thursday morning, June 15, the President, the Right Hon. William Kenrick, in the chair. It was followed by a brief discussion.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD opened the discussion. Of the reasons for non-attendance at public worship one seemed to her of special importance, and that was the multiplicity of engagements. It was not only amusements and recreation, but even in the case of recreation that was demanded by the strenuousness of their work during the week. There was one day in the week for recreation, and it had to be divided out to the various forms of recreation, of which the church services provided for the mind and spirit, and were therefore most precious of all. There was not the same compulsion as formerly to attend services, and there had been a re-adjustment of values; thoughtful and logical people went to church to get comfort and strength, to measure their real by the highest ideal, and to thank God for all the blessings of a glorious life. But if at church they did not get these things they stayed away. Mr. Freeston had said he loved to sit at the feet of a layman, if he could choose his layman. Perhaps they might say the same of their ministers. But with them there ought to be no distinction of ministers and laity; theirs were democratic assemblies, and until they felt that each one had a part in it they were not doing their duty as members of their church. By tradition and birthright she was a descendant of the Puritans, and she loved their memory; but she wanted to grow, and she wanted symbols in religious service, but symbols of real belief, not symbols of some church which they did not believe. They believed with Martineau that humanity was an incarnation of the Eternal, and that God speaks to each one. They ought not, therefore, to confine their readings to the Bible in religious services. And whoever had a message it must be given, however unworthy the messenger might be, neither sex nor "orders" mattered.

The Rev. JAMES RUDDLE said that people did not come to church, because they were not driven thither by spiritual hunger nor attracted by spiritual music. They had found out that the world went on on and was not much affected by anything said or done in the church. They were all to blame in that matter. There was a time when their opportunity came. When the Revised Version of the New Testament was issued, it began to be clear that the man in the street would be orthodox no longer, and would be, roughly speaking, at one with them in doctrine in the Unitarian churches. Then they should have begun to draw the inferences of their doctrine, and to have shown the people how Christ could speak to man as man, that he was one who could be trusted even by men of common sense. They ought to have shown how his precepts in the Sermon on the Mount could be applied to practical life. If they had shown how religion was against the spirit of domineering in great societies, on the part of capitalists, and in empires, and what trust in God really meant, and what their own life ought to be, then people would have felt the need to come. He gave, in conclusion, a striking instance of how not only the Bible, but English literature, as in Milton's great poems, could be shown to be alive with inspiration and of moving power in religion.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES touched upon only one point. He could not understand how it was that they, the freest of the free, who had less of the priestly office than any other, were yet almost the only church in which laymen do not take any part in the services. They sent their sons to church schools, where they learnt to read the lessons, and yet when they came home they made no use of that gift. It was not the ministers' fault. It was the congregations who were to blame.

The Rev. H. S. PERRIS said that there were some churches which were filled, and they ought to study their methods and see why that was so. With the people who did not go to church it was not a matter of theological belief alone, but of social conditions. People with strong democratic sympathies would not go to a church where they felt that the ruling power was an oligarchy, drawn from one social rank alone. And they wanted answers to the questions which were teasing them all through their daily lives. If the churches did not help in that direction they stayed away.

The Rev. F. K. FREESTON having briefly replied on the discussion, the meeting was brought to a close.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

THE Annual Meeting of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union, was held at Essex Hall, on Thursday afternoon, June 15, the President, Miss Tagart, in the chair.

Miss FLORENCE HILL, the Hon. Secretary, presented the seventeenth annual Report, which opened with the following passages:

"The need of an agency such as the Postal Mission has never been more clearly shown than during the past year. To every Mission have come letters from 'seekers after truth,' from 'earnest inquirers,' who are feeling their way out of narrow creeds, and are groping for fresh light, or from those who, in despair of finding a reasonable religion, have cast off all faith. And not only do letters come from Protestants and Catholics in our own country, but from distant colonies and remote islands; telling what a satisfaction it is to receive religious literature which sets forth such a high moral ideal, combined with sound common-sense. And the literature wings its way still further, reaching the intellectual Brahmo, and the cultured Mohammedan and Buddhist; whilst it also meets the needs of the missionary, preaching to ignorant heathen tribes in Africa, who finds the simplicity of the Unitarian faith comprehensible and easy to explain.

"The controversy about the Education Act, the sensational missions held in Wales and England, and the disturbance in the Scotch Churches, have lately brought religious questions very much before the public, and into discussion in the newspaper columns. The Postal Missions that seized this opportunity to offer Unitarian literature promptly in suitable papers have met with a very great response. The tracts have been read and handed on, and so Unitarianism has been introduced to whole circles of people who were before quite ignorant of its teaching. Dr. Torrey's violent attack on Unitarians has very much quickened interest, and people have written from all parts of England to ascertain what this religion really is; many (even orthodox) have been shocked at the ferocity of his attack. At Bristol more particularly, where memory still holds dear and sacred, saints like Mary Carpenter and other Unitarian worthies, great indignation has been felt, and groups of people thus aroused are feeling their way into Unitarianism."

The report then gave particulars of various branches of the work, noting that during the year there had been 1,665 new applicants for literature, and there were 1,758 old correspondents still on the books. 1,956 books had been lent from the various P.M. libraries, 33 persons had been known to join congregations through the Missions. The report concluded with a tribute to the memory of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and Mrs. Jenkin Davies.

Miss ETHEL C. LAKE, the Treasurer, presented the accounts, which, owing to the receipt of a legacy of £50, from the late Mrs. Yelland, showed a balance of £7 10s. 4d. from 1903, increased to £27 10s. 6d, and £30 transferred to the reserve fund. The total was £186 14s. 8d. The accounts of the Suffolk Village Mission which was balanced by the transfer of £40 1s. 4d. from the General Fund, showed a total of £164 11s. 11d. The treasurer said they could not depend on legacies, and she should not be content until their subscription list was increased by £30. For that increase she made a special appeal.

Mrs. COOPER, of Ipswich, moved the adoption of the report and accounts. Miss GITTINS, who seconded, gave some interesting particulars of the little group of earnest working men at Coalville, near Leicester, who were now meeting regularly for worship in their own houses. In presenting our gospel to the people, she said, it was not only intellectual controversy that was wanted, but the spirit of love and sympathy with their aspirations after a better life.

Mr. H. ISON, one of the leaders of the Coalville group, told how they had determined to make a religious home for themselves, and then went on to speak of the present condition of religious thought, as detrimental to the advancement of religious life, and of the value of the quiet, educative work done by the Postal Mission. It was not only intellectual interest that was quickened, they gained a truer grasp of life, and the right spirit in which to face death. It was impossible to say how much they owed to such men as Maritneau and Channing, Savage and Chadwick. They revealed the thought of God to the living soul. To others yet unborn they must hand on the light of that teaching.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, also supported the resolution, and expressed his pleasure in being at that, a kind of experience meeting, the most practical of the week. He had himself run a kind of Postal Mission of his own for about 40 years, and was convinced of its value. He commended the practice of leaving literature in trains and other places, to set people thinking. From his own experience, he said, they would be surprised at the kind of hungry person their literature reached. Unitarians ought to be very alive to that work. One reason was because they had so few congregations, and their constituents should be the scattered strangers, as it was in "Our Father's Church." He believed in going out to the multitude. They ought to shepherd the scattered strangers.

The report having been adopted, the Committee and Officers were appointed, on the motion of the Rev. A. Webster, seconded by Mr. H. Toogood, of Kingswood, near Bristol.

Mr. WEBSTER urged the need of popular books dealing with the secularism of the day, for he found numbers of intelligent young men were being led away from religion by Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe." He commended Bixby's "Similarities of Physical and Religious Knowledge," and "The New World and the New Thought," and Savage's "Evolution of Religion," as specially helpful in that direction; and gave an instance of the warm response elicited by Armstrong's "God and the Soul."

Mr. TOOGOOD, in a very earnest speech, told how, preparing for the Free Methodist Ministry, he had been brought to Unitarianism, led by the preposterous attack of Dr. Torrey to inquire in to the matter. They were doing a great work, he said, and he was convinced that Unitarianism was the future religion of the people.

Miss CLEPHAM said that when she heard anyone avow himself a convert, she asked what they had to give? There were many influences at work to rouse the intellect. Even Dr. Torrey's Mission was rousing the intellect of non-thinkers more than they could do, and it was rousing antagonism to narrowness; what they must do was to see that feeling was not neglected. Religion, unless kept warm by fervour, was starved in the long run. In their mission work, the intellectual part might help, but it did not go far enough; when they touched the soul, and wakened spiritual sympathy, their work was crowned. That should always be their great aim.

Mr. R. NEWELL having given an account of the work of the village mission at Bedfield, the meeting was brought to a close.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE twelfth annual meeting was held at Essex Hall on Friday, June 16. A conference was held in the afternoon, and the business meeting after tea.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, who presided at the conference, which opened with hymn and prayer, stated and answered two objections to temperance. The first was that total abstainers were of all people the most intemperate in their language. To which he replied, that he did not think they were really worse than other people; but if they were, the terrible facts of the case justified the very strongest language. The second was that true temperance was moderation, not total abstinence. But if alcohol was a poison, even in small quantities, and the highest medical authorities more and more inclined to that view, and the evidence showed that total abstainers on an average really did live longer than other people, that objection could not hold. Alcohol was a poison not only to the human body but to the body politic, as the cause of enormous waste and poverty. It was poison to the higher life of man, sapping both intellect and the sense of moral responsibility. Drink and the spiritual faculties did not go together. Therefore, they maintained that total abstinence was the true temperance in respect to that most noxious thing.

Mr. EDWARD CHITTY, of Dover, read an earnest and eloquent paper on "The Importance of the Pledge." They took the pledge, he said, as a sure defence against danger to themselves, and also for the sake of others. A man who was pledged was more likely to persuade others to take it, where there was need. Some said it was more manly not to take a pledge; but if thereby they could help others, that surely was the most manly thing. There was urgent need for combination, to rid the country of the ills caused by drink. As a united society they could exercise more influence, and their society could enter into relations with other societies. He would like to see every woman belong to the World's Temperance Union, and every man a Good Templar. They must do individual work, but not that alone. He was thankful for all other influences that made for temperance, the efforts of the legislature, of justices and magistrates, efforts for providing counter-attractions to the public-house, wholesome amusements, higher interests and all healthy influences, efforts for better housing of the people, and in every way securing healthier conditions of life. But after all they must never relax their direct efforts against alcohol, which, wherever it was consumed, brought ruin and ills innumerable. As abstainers they could do the most effective work, and, above all, as enrolled abstainers. They were fighting ignorance, brutality, impurity and greed, working for the time when every English child should know what it was to have a happy home, and England should be a truly Christian nation.

The Rev. H. S. SOLLY, who opened the discussion, said he was opposed to a life-long pledge; it was what they ought not to ask of their young people. An indefinite pledge was better. Their best work at Bridport was done in the Band of Hope, and then in the Temperance Society which the children joined at 14. Then they signed the pledge; and he described an experiment they were making to secure a genuine membership, and avoid the damage done by professing members, who were known in the town not to keep their pledge. What they asked was a pledge to abstain "while a member," and to hand in the card of membership if at any time they wished to withdraw; and every year the card was to be endorsed by the secretary's signature. So they hoped to maintain the standard of their membership.

The Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH strongly objected to such a method, as suggesting distrust of their members. He himself was an abstainer and not pledged. The simple inward determination to abstain seemed to him a better thing, and to give more force to the professed conviction that abstinence was wise. Having signed a pledge seemed to him a subtle inroad on a man's self-respect. It was better to trust to the determination of character.

The Rev. W. HARRISON did not approve of Mr. Solly's suggestion, and was rather in favour of a definite pledge.

The EARL OF CARLISLE (the President) said that Mr. Charlesworth's argument would have appealed to him before he took the pledge, some twenty-five years ago, but experience showed that where it was most required, the pledge was best, both for oneself, and for the sake of influencing others. But it was important that people should not feel that they were taking a life-long pledge. It was wise, when a man hesitated about an indefinite pledge, to ask him to take it for a definite time. The experience even of a year's abstinence was so much to the good.

Mr. F. ADKINS, of the Band of Hope Union, also spoke, strongly maintaining the value of the pledge.

Mr. B. C. GHOSH gave most interesting testimony from his own experience, on his first voyage from India, and when he went to Cambridge, of the value his pledge, taken as a boy at home, had been to him, in saving him from falling in with the drinking habits of society on board ship and in the University. When he came afterwards to study the medical aspect of the matter, he saw how wise that course had been. Mr. Charlesworth's argument might be right for men like himself, with formed character; but for young people with character unformed, the pledge was indispensable.

Mr. CHITTY having replied, the meeting adjourned for tea.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

At the evening business meeting the chair was taken by the Earl of Carlisle, the President.

Mr. J. BREDALL, hon. sec., presented the report, which recorded a membership of 5,950 in the affiliated societies, and an average attendance of 4,621. There were 216 individual members of the Association. Of the 364 ministers, whose names appear in the "Essex Hall Year Book," 119 are known to be abstainers, and 17 others are actively engaged in temperance work. The report concluded with a memorial notice of three well known workers, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, Arthur Harvie, and John Davies.

Mr. F. A. EDWARDS, as treasurer, presented the accounts, which, with a total expenditure of £82 12s., showed the balance in hand reduced from £6 7s. 9d. to 5s. 4d.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that the most important side of their work had been discussed that afternoon—the question of the pledge and increasing the number of teetotalers. On the legislative side they had opposed the Bill before Parliament, which unfortunately had become law; but he was disposed to think they were too much inclined to confine themselves to saying they would reverse that legislation; they should try and make the best of what was open to them at the present time. He still held that the Bill was a retrograde step, but nevertheless believed that something could be done with it. It contained certain machinery for reducing the number of public-houses, and if nothing had as yet been done it was perhaps because every county was waiting to see what the others would do. He had himself been engaged during the last few days in colouring maps of the county of Cumberland to show the relative position of every parish in the matter of licences, according to Lord Peel's standard. There were a few white spots where there was no excess of licences; but 22 parishes had four times too many, 33 had three times too many, and so on, each grade being marked by a different colour. That might be done in other districts, to show the actual state of things, to bring home to the magistrates and licensing committee what could be done under the existing law. He had recently presented a petition from their committee in support of the Archbishop of Canterbury's Bill to amend the Bill of last year, and though the temperance party in the House of Lords was somewhat microscopic, they came within six of passing the second reading. That minority was not a matter of party; it contained a considerable number of very moderate people who voted on the merits of the question. He urged the need for stronger organisation to make their influence felt on such questions, and on that ground commended their Association to a more widespread support.

The Rev. W. MOTTRAM, secretary of the Congregational Temperance Association, seconding the resolution, spoke especially of the dire effects of intemperance on the womanhood and child life of the country.

Mrs. TUCKER supported it, in a very earnest speech, telling how she had been led to devote herself to temperance work by Mr. Armstrong's encouragement, and how much they would gain by joining the "British Women."

The Rev. ROWLAND HILL pleaded the great importance of Band of Hope work.

The Rev. H. HAUGERUD, in a striking speech, cited "Rip van Winkle," and the fatal result of his "this time don't count." Therefore, he said, he believed strongly in signing the pledge.

The resolution having been passed, the officers and committee were elected, with Lord Carlisle as President, on the motion of the Rev. F. SUMMERS, seconded by the Rev. J. C. STREET. Though "temperance" to the backbone, Mr. Street said he had never yet joined that Association. He was one of the early fighters for temperance in the days when all fought together on a common platform. But then sectarian differences came in, and many platforms were closed to him, and he had suffered keenly. So he had feared the Unitarian name would sectarianise the work of that Association; but seeing what good work they were doing, if they did not interfere with his catholicity, he thought he would have to come in.

The Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH then moved, and the Rev. W. L. SCHROEDER seconded:—"That in view of the temptations and the grave evils arising from the sale of intoxicating liquors, this meeting is of opinion that power should be given to Licensing Authorities to reduce, in their several districts, the period during which such liquors may be sold both on licensed premises and in clubs." Both mover and seconder spoke eloquently and earnestly in support of the resolution and for temperance as essential to the true life of man. The Rev. J. L. PHALEN supported it, and in offering the greetings of the Unitarian Temperance Society of the United States, concluded with Dr. Hale's well-known watchword: "Look up, and not down; look out, and not in; look forward, and not back, and lend a hand."

An amendment by the Rev. F. SUMMERS, to leave out "and in clubs," not being seconded, the resolution was passed. A collection taken during the meeting amounted to £5 13s. 5d.

A vote of thanks to the officers, and to the chairman and speakers, moved by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, and seconded by Mr. T. P. YOUNG, concluding the proceedings.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Brighton.—Flower services were held on Sunday, June 18, in splendid weather, a special children's service being held in the afternoon, in addition to the usual services. There were good congregations. The offerings of flowers, chiefly in pots, were very beautiful, and were sent to the Brighton workhouse immediately after evening service. Special hymns were sung by the children at the afternoon service. Rev. Priestley Prime preached on each occasion. In connection with the church, rambles over the Downs and through the country lanes are popular, and afford a pleasant opportunity for members and friends to become better acquainted with each other.

Capel-y-Bryn.—Last Sunday the Rev. John Evans, of Colne, preached here and at Allty-placa and Sychbant, on "Our Unitarian belief and its relation to the present and future life." On Wednesday he was married to Miss Rachel Davies, Mill Rose Park, the service being conducted by the Rev. J. Davies and the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, of Walmsley.

Forest Gate.—The Rev. H. W. Perris has just concluded a series of Sunday evening discourses under the general heading of "Glimpses of Religious Life in the Middle Ages." Sketches of Anthony, Benedict, Francis, Abelard, and others led up to a survey of the influences which inaugurated the Reformation and modern thought. The attendance and interest manifested have been very encouraging.

Ilkeston.—The High-street chapel was opened on Sunday June 18, after thorough renovation, the services afternoon and evening, being conducted by the Rev. W. Lindsay, of Christ Church, Nottingham. The local Advertiser devotes more than a column to a report of Mr. Lindsay's evening sermon, which was an exposition of the Unitarian position, as both Biblical and reasonable in its interpretation of the Gospel of Christ.

Gateshead.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 18; good congregations assembled morning and evening, the preacher being the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal. There was a public tea and meeting on Monday; at the latter Mr. C. Carter presided, and other speakers were Revs. Herbert V. Mills, G. A. Ferguson Mr. S. Hulse (secretary), Mr. E. R. Lowe (treasurer). Special reference was made to the loss our churches had sustained, and especially Gateshead, by the death of its founder, Rev. Arthur Harvie. Encouraging reports were made by the secretary and treasurer; friends rendered songs. A vote of thanks was heartily accorded Mr. Mills on the motion of Mr. Ferguson and Mr. E. H. Coysh. An enjoyable anniversary was brought to a close by singing, "Our Father's Faith."

London Sunday School Society.—The aggregate meeting for teachers and elder scholars was held at Essex Hall on Sunday afternoon, when the service was conducted by Miss Marian Pritchard. The hall was by no means full, but there was a goodly gathering of young people and the hymns were heartily sung. The choir, conducted by Mr. F. W. Turner, gave as an anthem Mr. Hugh Atkins' musical setting of the parable of "The Sower." Miss Pritchard's address was from the words, "Choose you this day whom ye will serve." She dwelt upon the importance of having the right sort of master, and of worshipping the living God, not the "god of getting on," in an unworthy sense, or the "god of pleasure," for these both led to an ignoble slavery. Having pictured the experience of two apprentices, one with a good-natured, easy-going master, the other with a strict, but good master, she said it would be well if the young people would apprentice themselves for seven years to the Master of Life. There were many things to learn, e.g., always to look on the bright side of things, to look for the really good things of life, and, above all, to learn self-control, without which they could learn nothing else. The sunny afternoon added much to the pleasure of the gathering.

Manchester: Goulden-street Mission.—On Whit Saturday, through the kindness of a friend, the Rev. B. Walker took over seventy of his poor friends—children and adults—by lurries to Heaton Park, where, in spite of a rainy day, they enjoyed themselves immensely. The meeting room in Goulden-street has just been beautified, and pictures of sacred subjects hung upon the walls. The religious services were never better attended, and the prospects of the Mission were never brighter.

Scarborough.—Visitors are requested to notice that on and after Sunday, July 2, the time of evening service will be altered from 7 to 6.30.

Words and Music . (net) 3s. 6d.
Words Edition only . (net) 1s. 6d.

NOVELLO & CO., 1, Berners St., London, W.

This book has been prepared for churches of the Liberal Faith, and chiefly with a view to supplying a long-felt want—a book in which the appropriate tune is on the same page with the hymn. The words have been carefully selected to provide expression, not for one school of thought only among Liberal churches, but for the whole range of religious life and experience. The musical Edition contains most of the well-known and popular tunes by Dykes, Sullivan, Barnby, Stainer, &c., associated with familiar hymns, and new tunes by well-known musicians for newer hymns. The harmonies have been revised by Mr. Granville Bantock.

Special terms are offered to churches taking quantities. Application must be made in all such cases to the Secretary, 3, John Street, Hampstead, London, N.W.

Signed on behalf of the Compilers—
JOSEPH WOOD, Chairman.
GEORGE H. LEIGH, Treasurer.
HENRY GOW, Secretary.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

DEAN FREMANTLE, of Ripon, who is seventy-four this year, has just celebrated the jubilee of his ordination in 1855. From 1854 to 1864 he was Fellow of All Souls', Oxford, and from 1866 to 1883 Rector of St. Mary's, Bryanston-square. He has been Dean of Ripon for the last ten years. Preaching in his cathedral on the evening of Trinity Sunday, the anniversay of his ordination, the Dean reviewed the progress of religious thought during the past half-century, and noted as the greatest change of all the new understanding of the Fatherhood of God. The better hope for all mankind and the better use of the Bible, as a progressive revelation, were also dwelt upon; and the Dean expressed his confidence in democracy, both in politics and religion.

AN important movement has been started in Manchester, with a view to defining the lines upon which the Education Acts should be amended. That amendment of some kind is necessary most people who know anything about the subject seem to agree. It is quite a different thing to decide the direction of further legislation. The new Manchester movement is described in Monday's Manchester Guardian by Principal Adeney (Independent College), who says recent conferences, apparently prolonged and painstaking, have been held by "about a dozen men of various religious denominations," and who now publishes the result of their deliberations.

IN a lengthy letter introducing the Twelve Articles which are put forth as an "educational concordat" Dr. Adeney enumerates the persons attending these conferences, and rightly emphasises the fact that they included such men of position as the Chairman of the Salford Education Committee (Canon Scott), the President of the Manchester Free Church Council, and the Chairman of the Lancashire Congregational Union, and points out that, in addition to other Church clergy and Nonconformist ministers, there were also present four members of the Manchester University Faculty of Theology "attached to four different religious denominations." It would have been useful to know exactly who these were, as from all that appears the "concordat" seems to be based on the assumption that the chief, if not the only, questions at issue are those that divide Evangelical Nonconformists from the Established Church.

COMING to the proposals offered, we find all parties represented by them agreed that a "purely secular" plan would be disastrously defeated at the polls. Perhaps so, but not so assuredly as at any former time, we think. No doubt, however, the vast majority of those who take real interest in the schools would repudiate such a plan; while there are thousands of voters who would be up in arms on behalf of "Bible teaching," were it threatened, who personally know very little about the Bible, and do not read a page of it except on very rare occasions. Well, supposing the Clerico-Nonconforming Conference is right here, how do they propose to deal with the religious difficulty? That this is the chief bone of contention everyone knows; it is no use lamenting the fact that vastly more heat and passion are spent about it than on the matter of efficiency and economy—both somewhat important things, too.

THE "Twelve Articles" say, first, there should be uniformity of law and management for all schools. "Existing Voluntary Schools" should be rented or acquired upon due compensation. This is a sound principle, and agreement on this point shows that we are approaching an end of the dual system which has so long hampered the work of education in this country. Next, as to teachers:—There should be no religious test imposed. Nevertheless, teachers must be "qualified" before being allowed to give religious instruction; that is, they must be "teachers who can give satisfactory proof of competent knowledge in their subjects" (what subjects, other than the contents and literal sense of Scripture?) "and who are willing to declare that they do not dissent from the teachings which they will have to give." This seems a slippery clause indeed. Does it look towards a specific interpretation of Scripture in some doctrinal sense? It is provided in Art. iv. that no religious teaching should be included in the time-table which is inconsistent with the Cowper-Temple clause, i.e., which is denominationally distinctive. How, then, will the ordinary teacher have to "qualify"? Is he to declare his assent to the miraculous? Must he be precluded from a rational view of "prophecy"? Knowing what we know of Dr. Adeney, we cannot think he meant this kind of thing, but we are puzzled how to take it.

Two other points, in a scheme bristling with them, demand a word. They relate to the "distinctive" religious teaching which the "concordat" would provide for, in accordance with the unflinching demand of the clergy. Such doctrinal teaching, it is suggested, should not be in the regular time-table, should be given at the charge of the denomination, by a teacher competent to keep order—"as much as possible by the teachers of the school"—and this teaching is not to "reflect in any way on the tenets or status of any religious body." But how can a zealous Churchman, or sturdy Nonconformist, teach his "distinctive" views and obey this article? We fear the kindly temper of those responsible for the plan under consideration has led them to minimise the real difficulty involved in conscientious sectarianism. The other point is in regard to attendance at the religious instruction. Although the "distinctive" religious instruction should not be in the time-table, it is proposed to be given during regular school hours; and, as we understand it, the thing would work this way:—A, B, and C, being children whose parents desire the "distinctive" teaching, would be exempted from ordinary school attendance during the time set apart from it, but unless they were found in regular attendance at the special class the exemption would be withdrawn, and they would be compelled (subject to a conscience clause) to attend the ordinary Biblical lessons with D to Z, the rest of the children. Although Dr. Adeney defends this scheme, it does not appear very practicable to us; indeed, with one exception, it seems the worst suggestion made. The exception we have in view is that already criticised, viz., the demand to be made for the teacher's assent to what he is to teach. Logically this may be all right, but practically it is "testing" again; and if we are going to be logical we may as well get rid of the religious difficulty altogether.

THIS is an age of exhibitions. The grand International Exposition at Paris still provides material for philanthropic and sociological discussions, and beyond doubt the present Exposition at Liége will furnish further matter of thought. A less world-wide recognition will be given to the first large Missionary Exhibition, just opened at Blackburn. The industries, the manners, the religions of nations of widely diverse cultures in all parts of the world are brought in an easy way before the eyes of members of the churches. The intense interest of missionary work is here illustrated. "From every point of view," we learn, "social, industrial, religious, ethnological, and philosophical—the Exhibition is full of deepest interest. Our churches have often failed to reach men because they have made religion so intensely dull. . . . . The Missionary Exhibition has at least dispelled that false idea."

THE Exhibition is likely to issue in a more instructed devotion to missionary enterprise. But, if we may judge from the account in the Examiner, it is strangely incomplete and one-sided. Visitors are shown the horrible weapons with which the heathen used to fight before they learned the better way of Jesus Christ. We hear nothing of the submarine, that product of our civilisation which is surely more horrible than any weapon any savage ever used. We may learn from this Exhibition how Western ideas are working a gradual change in the life and customs of heathen peoples. We must still turn to the essays of a Lafcadio Hearn or to Mr. Fielding's "Soul of a People" to learn how much in many respects we have yet to learn from so-called heathen peoples. And we may not forget that the good done even to backward races by the missionary pioneers of civilisation is set off by manifold dangers. The aim is too little to make barbarians good barbarians, too much to render them inferior hangers on of a race culture which is alien to their own. For all this the idea of the Exhibition is a good one, as it fosters a wiser interest in those peoples throughout the world with whom in commerce and by government we are increasingly brought in contact.

THE various Methodist societies have been holding, are holding, or will shortly be holding their annual Conferences. On the whole, as far as may be judged from reports already accessible, the officers of the churches are able to give in their accounts with joy and not with trembling. The Primitive Methodists, whose Conference was held at Scarborough, report a membership of about 205,800, an increase of 4,600; they have 1,124 travelling preachers, and more than 16,000 local preachers. In the home districts there are 4,406 chapels; forty-eight chapels have been built during the year. It is calculated that they have sittings for over a million persons, and that the actual number of hearers is over 600,000. The Sunday-school statistics indicate prosperity; and a Sunday-school Lecture-ship, in connection with the Triennial Sunday-school Conferences, has been founded. The enlargement of the college in Manchester is proceeding rapidly, and it is expected that the new premises will be ready by next Conference. Forty-four ministers were received into full connexion; and there are now seventy-two students at the college. At present the matter of Methodist Union is not very earnestly taken up by the Primitives; at the close of the debate on the subject, Mr. W. P. Hartley regretfully remarked that he had come to the conclusion that there was no general desire for Union. Meantime, if the proposed union of the three Methodist Churches, which are now negotiating, should really take place, it will be impossible for the Primitive Methodists and the Wesleyans to remain unaffected and unmoved by that event. The President of the Primitive Methodist Conference is the Rev. G. E. Butt, recently returned after seventeen years' mission work in South Africa.

THE Methodist New Connexion has held its annual Conference in Leeds. The most exciting, if not the most important, matter with which it had to deal was the question of Methodist Union, and especially the formal and final answer of the Conference to the somewhat ill-timed and embarrassing overtures made to it by the Wesleyan Methodists. The answer was clear and decisive to this effect: We are not free to accept your invitation, for we are already negotiating with two other Methodist Churches; further, your invitation is conditional upon our accepting the "Pastoral Conference," "which would deprive laymen of duties and privileges of which they have been in full and rightful possession in our church for 108 years." It is noted that at the Conference not a single layman supported the amendment in favour of appointing a committee to meet the Wesleyan committee, and the resolution just summarised was carried by 146 votes to 16. The general impression is that the decided and dignified action of the New Connexion has assured the success of the movement for Union. The Free Methodists and the Bible Christians will feel bound to respond to the faithful action of their comrades by hearty recognition and hearty co-operation; and it seems probable that all the difficulties of the task will yield to the patient, persistent efforts of the churches concerned. As the Free Methodist remarks: "From Leeds the word has gone out to the United Methodist Free Churches and the Bible Christians, 'The New Connexion cleaves to you.'"

THE annual meetings of the Churchmen's Union for the Advancement of Liberal Religious Thought, and of the English Church Union, have both been held in London this week. The report of the latter Union avowed the determination to resist any alteration in the use of the Athanasian Creed, and to maintain the Church's independence of Parliament and civil tribunals in spiritual matters, under the "common law of the whole Catholic Church of Christ." Lord Halifax, as President, spoke strongly in the same sense. The Liberal Churchmen, on the other hand, welcomed the move made by some of the Bishops for greater freedom in the matter of the Athanasian Creed, and earnestly enforced the claims of critical studies for the progress of religious knowledge.

THE annual meeting and re-union of old students of Mansfield College was held at Oxford last week. Mr. A. W. W. Dale, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Liverpool, who was elected last October in succession to the late Dr. Mackennal, Chairman of the Council and of the Board of Education, presided at the business meeting, and urged a closer relation between the colleges and the churches. The responsibility of the church to the minister began, he said, when it sent the man to the college.

IT is proposed to form an international Congregational Society, or rather to give this new name to the old Colonial Missionary Society. The suggestion is offered by Dr. Bevan, who has had wide experience both in the Old Word and the New. His plea for a new title is also an argument for a change in working to correspond with changes already accomplished in English communities across the sea. "Colonial?" suggests something of the pioneer and of immaturity. But the Australian Colonies are fully formed States. And Missionary, says Dr. Bevan, suggests something of inferiority. What is wanted is a union between equals, a society the constituent members of which will be the territorial unions of churches. Dr. Bevan's address, which was delivered to the Colonial Missionary Society, is to be printed with a view to full discussion at a future intercolonial conference.

THE Co-operative Congress held this year at Paisley has recognised the need to take a larger share in the legislative and administrative government of the country, but has refused to be identified with the Labour Representation Committee. Trades Unionism and Co-operation are in friendly relationship, and a large proportion of the two and a quarter millions of co-operators are in accord with trades unions, but there is no probability of the two movements becoming organically one. This year's congress exemplifies the growing concern of co-operators in political reform, better housing, economy of national expenditure, and just taxation. A resolution in favour of the taxation of land values, whether occupied or unoccupied, was carried by an overwhelming majority. Co-operators perceive that what they save or gain by co-operation may be, and often is, squandered by a wasteful Government, and that the good they aim at may be thwarted or annulled by class legislation.

BLESSED are they that find God's love ever present,
Light amid darkness, peace amid confusion,
A true consolation, a solid present fact.
Such men and women exist, under more than one creed.
If faith cannot always be joyful, yet may it always be strong,
Comforted by the fixed assurance that God even now reigneth.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

THE arrangement of a small collection of books upon the shelves is a matter of some difficulty. It is the special corners that make a library delightful. Here, for instance, are the solid volumes of history or technical scholarship. Here in a place apart is the goodly company of English poets. Close by them are rows of Ruskin and Matthew Arnold and other great writers of prose. Another corner betrays a catholic taste, for it is sacred to Cardinal Newman and the literature of the Oxford Movement. And here in a special place of honour are the books which represent the special hobby of their owner, often a sore perplexity to his friends; but they reveal, to those who know, his skill as a collector or the nice points of his scholarship. I knew one man who had the strange idea of procuring as many separate editions of the "Pilgrim's Progress" as possible. Another acquaintance of mine can hardly keep his hands off a Franciscan book, and his library has quite a Minorite flavour. They are both very innocent hobbies, and I doubt whether they cost so much as many other forms of spoit.

My friend Libellus is the owner of a small library, and he takes a good deal of trouble over this matter of arrangement. He has this one thing in common with Mr. Gladstone, that he finds an unfailing source of refreshment in rearranging his books. His friends often laugh at him for the way in which he fondles a favourite volume, as though it were sensible of kindness, and would be unhappy if placed in the wrong company. But the laughter does not deter him, and he returns with zest to the impossible task of making shelves elastic and circumventing the wickedness of publishers in producing books so unequal in size. The arrival of a second-hand book is an event of importance. It is a new lodger to be housed; and if it comes fairly adorned the pleasure of Libellus is redoubled, for he has a nice taste in bindings. Sometimes when he is in a good humour he shows me some of his treasures. A short time ago it was a copy of the "Love Songs of Connacht" by Douglas Hyde, formerly in the possession of Professor York Powell, with his characteristic signature. The original covers had been preserved, and the whole was encased in a beautiful binding with a shamrock pattern.

This reminds me that though Libellus is by no means a collector of Irish books, he has a corner devoted to W. B. Yeats and Lady Gregory and Miss Emily Lawless and Moira O'Neill. They are some of them, in their freshness and beauty, just the thing for a holiday mood. There is, for instance, Lady Gregory's delightful volume of studies and translations called "Poets and Dreamers." To many English people its atmosphere will be like that of a new world, full of haunting magic. It takes the reader closer to the heart of the Irish peasantry than many more elaborate studies of their characteristics. It is also full of interest for the student of folklore and the lover of stories. Here you may read of Raftery, the blind poet, and his dreams of beauty and his strange wandering life; of the popular ballads which came into existence during the Boer war, with their passionate sympathy for the Transvaal farmers—was not one old peasant woman heard to say that the Boers must be Catholics, "or the English would not be against them?"—and, perhaps most curious and original of all, of the stories, full of a prodigal splendour of imagination, told by the old men in a country workhouse as they sit dreaming in the sun. If any of my readers are tempted to explore further in the same direction let me recommend them to get "My New Curate," by Father Sheehan. Its bright mirth, and Irish human nature and simple pathos are irresistible. If it teaches some hard Protestant hearts that a priest is a man to be loved, the lesson will only increase the sense of holiday refreshment for all lovers of their kind.

It is curious, the difference of our winter and summer attitude towards books. There is a fitness to the season even in what we read. A stately seventeenth century folio, with its quaint engraved portrait and title-page, seems to belong to the long evenings when the curtains are drawn, and the warm light of the fire is reflected from the books on the walls. But the summer sunshine and the long twilight of June bring other moods. They send us to the out-of-door books, which distil the influences of the open air, and revive in us the primitive instincts of the vagabond. Every library should have its nook for books of this kind. Libellus has a small collection of Alpine literature, in which he confesses that he finds much refreshment. He was good enough to show me some of his volumes the other day—Whymper's "Scrambles among the Alps," Butler's "Alps and Sanctuaries," "Peaks, Passes, and Glaciers," not, alas! in the rare first edition; Tyndall's "Hours of Exercise" and "Glaciers of the Alps;" Martin Conway's recent book with its sumptuous coloured illustrations; Bennett's "Alpine Flora," and the Badminton book on Mountaineering. But he tells me that he esteems as prime favourite "The Playground of Europe," by Leslie Stephen, for it combines in a unique degree the flavour of good literature with the fascination of the mountains. Then for more meditative and pastoral moods there are "The Compleat Angler" and White's "Selborne," with Edmund New's delightful illustrations, so typically English, and withal so sunny. It is surely a triumph to be able to steep a black and white drawing in warm, mellow sunshine.

A delightful open-air book which came into my hands a short time ago is worthy of mention. Again my friend Libellus must have the credit of introducing me to it, and the blame, if such it be, of making me run to the extravagance of its purchase. I refer to the "Homes of the First Franciscans," by Beryl D. de Selincourt. It is a pleasant study in topography, full of true reverence for the saint and the charm of the simple Franciscan retreats in the Apennines. Retreat is the right word to use; for it emphasises the feature of the early Franciscan ideal, which is dwelt on continually in these pages, the close union between the life with Nature in its simplicity, austerity, and peace, and the life spent in beneficence, in the service of the poor. In these mountain dwellings of the Brothers there was as little as possible to interfere with the direct contact of the soul with the healing influences of Nature. "Nothing is more remarkable," says Mrs. de Selincourt, "in the early settlements of the Order than the association of the memory of their inmates with the caves or rocks of their natural surroundings, rather than with the human masonry; the buildings themselves are clearly planned so as to modify their natural background in the least possible degree. In almost every case a study of the forest homes of the Brothers involves an appreciation of natural scenery, rather than of architecture." To this I may add the following description of the hermitage on Monte Casale: "The convent, now inhabited by Cappucini, is one of the most quaint and picturesque of all the primitive Franciscan dwellings. It is, as usual, on a diminutive scale, hewn in great part out of the solid rock, with little adaptation to the demands of human stature. The buildings form a picturesque group, bounded in front by a narrow terrace and balcony, overlooking the valley and rising behind to the chapel, which is still in its original state, though it has received the addition of a raised loggia to prevent the rain and snow from beating down into it. It is a small, simple building, with low rafters and a single transept, and is decently and soberly preserved. Behind the altar, slightly below the level of the chapel, is a tiny choir. Close within the entrance-door on the left a dark vaulted passage, cut in the rock, slopes down to a grated window, through which can be seen the miniature cloisters of the convent, enclosing a stone well. Curious little china plaques, representing miracles of St. Francis, can just be discerned in the imperfect light decorating the well." It would be ungrateful not to mention how much the fine descriptive passages of the book are enhanced by the series of photographs. They help the eye in an unusual degree to realise the wild beauty and freedom of these unfamiliar mountain haunts.

Now that I have allowed myself to trespass into the fascinating region of Franciscan lore I may mention that Miss Macdonell has issued lately, in a small shilling volume, "The Words of St. Francis from his Works and the Early Legends." It does not pretend to be a complete or critical text, or an edition of the works which may be attributed to him. It is rather a selection of characteristic sayings for general readers, and it suffers, as every collection of the kind must do, by omission of the context. For those who want the actual works of St. Francis there is now a convenient Latin text published at Quaracchi in the Bibliotheca Franciscana Ascetica Medii Aevi. Many scholars will be of opinion, however, that editorial supervision needs to be carried much further, and that it errs on the side of inclusion. In the same series there is a collection of the sayings of Brother Giles. It is a small volume, easily slipped into the pocket, which will delight those who are wise enough to cultivate the friendship of the primitive Franciscans and the Latin of the Vulgate. But I fear that by these remarks I have betrayed inadvertently the identity of the man, who can hardly keep his hands off a Franciscan book. The collector of editions of the "Pilgrim's Progress" must not suffer from a similar revelation. Let him still keep an undeserved reputation for sanity with all dull people who despise literary hobbies.

THE LIFE EVERLASTING.*

THIS book consists largely of an exposition of the scriptural doctrine of immortality. To a future life as we understand it there are few references in the Old Testament, and these occur only in the later portions. Pre-exilic religion was concerned wholly with the present life. Now was the opportunity for communion with God, and for participating in the other privileges of His people. At death all this would come to an end. The nation, it is true, would go on, and God would continue to guide and bless it, but the individuals knew that they must follow their fathers to Sheol, the shadowy underworld where there was neither memory nor hope, nor the praise of God. Such a religion was apparently satisfying enough so long as the individuals were conscious only, or chiefly, of their privileges as members of a favoured race. But with the fall of Judah, and the exile, there began a time when they were made conscious rather of the hardships they had to endure for the sake of their God and nationality. Hence arose a new appreciation of individual worth and desert, which finally necessitated the belief that those who had lived and died faithful to the good cause, would be restored to life, and share the glories of Messiah's Kingdom. Outside ideas, Persian mainly, doubtless contributed much to the development of the doctrine of a general resurrection which appears as an article of the popular creed in the time of Jesus. In the synoptics Jesus is represented on one occasion as the champion of the resurrection doctrine,† but, as a rule, faith in a future life seems to have been a thing which he and his hearers assumed rather than argued about. The discourses in the Fourth Gospel our author regards as the ipsissima verba of Jesus, and naturally, therefore, he selects such texts as "In my Father's house are many mansions," as the basis of a simple exposition of the Master's views about the hereafter.

Mr. Purves speaks of the resurrection of Jesus as "the most wonderful fact of history," and considers it of fundamental importance in connection with the belief in immortality. For him the "fact" is sufficiently authenticated by the New Testament evidence. There we are told of apostles and others who had seen the Lord after his death upon the cross, and as they were honest and sensible witnesses their testimony must, he thinks, be accepted as conclusive. But the matter is not so simple nor so easily settled. We need not, of course, doubt the good faith and sense of these first disciples, but we question very much whether, in the majority of cases, we have their testimony just as it came from themselves. The only first-hand account indeed, is that of Paul in 1 Cor. xv., written, be it remembered, long before the Gospels of the Book of Acts. There he tells us of many to whom Jesus had appeared, adding, "and last of all as unto one born out of due time he appeared to me also." It is evident, however, from what he says in this chapter, and elsewhere (notably Gal. i. 15, 16, "It was the good pleasure of God . . . to reveal His son in me"), that in his own case, at any rate, it is a spiritual vision he means not an appearance in flesh and blood. Mr. Purves admits that Paul's teaching does not imply the physical resurrection of believers, and surely he ought also to recognise that it does not imply that of the Master himself. And if we are right in thinking that Christ's appearance to Paul was entirely of a spiritual nature, we shall be justified in believing that it was so in the other cases as well, and that the stories of the empty tomb and other details which signify a bodily resurrection, do not belong to the earliest tradition, but are later in their origin, and legendary in their character. Mr. Purves writes on the assumption that all the New Testament statements in regard to the resurrection are in perfect harmony, and his exposition, therefore, rather reflects the confusion of his sources, than throws light upon the "fact." In other respects, also, he shows himself too much under the influence of an uncritical scripturalism. Thus his chapter on the penal character of physical death may be a fairly accurate exposition of Pauline doctrine. True it is that death often comes as a punishment for sin, but to say that it does so always, that every son of man dies because he deserves to die, is another matter, and we prefer to believe with Emerson that what is so universal as death must be good, a blessing, and not even in origin a curse. As to what will become hereafter of those who are not Christians—that is, of the vast majority of our race—Mr. Purves finds in Scripture no clear indication. All he says is that their future is "dark indeed"—which is a little ambiguous. Evidently, however, he does not believe in everlasting punishment. He mentions this doctrine but once, and then only in reference to Tennyson's polemic against it in "Despair." Perhaps, as he expresses himself in another connection, the destiny of unbelievers is all "a question of how far the God we have seen in Christ can go!"

It is a pleasure to turn from Mr. Purves' discussions of the resurrection, and his expositions of Pauline doctrine to his chapters on the less controversial aspects of his subject. These chapters bristle with inverted commas, and the reader gets a very good idea of what men of science, philosophers, and poets, as well as theologians, have said on this profoundly interesting theme. It is plain, that apart from the acceptance of a miraculous resurrection, there are reasons enough for the hope that is in us. Indeed, as the Master himself, long ago pointed out, a physical resurrection could prove nothing as to the life to come. If we do not believe in immortality because of our faith in the goodness of God, in the rationality of the universe, in the divinity of the soul, in its love stronger than death, and its capacity for a growth beyond anything realised or realisable, in this brief and broken life, "neither should we be persuaded tif one rose from the dead." Why then should Mr. Purves, or anybody else, insist on the significance of an empty tomb?

AN EDUCATIONAL CONCORDAT.

THE following suggestions for an Educational Concordat, to which reference is made in our "Notes of the Week," was published on Monday:—

OWENS COLLEGE, May 19, 1905.

We, the undersigned, being deeply convinced of the desirability of coming to some settlement of the religious difficulties which have arisen in connection with the education question, venture to offer the following suggestions towards a solution. In doing so we may say that our agreement has not been reached without the concession on both sides of positions that are deemed important. But we have been specially guided by the desire to safeguard the religious character of our elementary schools, and the rights of religious liberty. We venture to hope that the new suggestions made by us may help to a solution, under which the more serious objections both to undenominational and to denominational teaching may be removed, and one which may unite all lovers of Christian education.

(1) The law for all schools and all denominations should be the same, and not be affected by any trust deed.

(2) All schools should be managed by the Authority. Existing voluntary schools should be rented from their owners, or reasonable compensation should be given.

(3) No religious test should be imposed upon any teacher; but, subject to this condition, regard should be had to the religious requirements of the schools in allocating the teachers.

(4) Bible teaching should be given at least three days in each week, but no religious teaching should be included in the time-table except such as has been, or shall be, ruled to be lawful under the Cowper-Temple clause.

(5) The Authority should invite representative members of the religious bodies to constitute a visiting or advisory committee to manage the ordinary Bible teaching in each school, and should, in doing so, as far as possible, have regard (a) to the religious conditions obtaining in the district served by the school, and (b) to the qualification of experience of religious work among children.

(6) All religious instruction should be given by qualified teachers—i.e., by teachers who can give satisfactory proof of competent knowledge in their subjects, and who are willing to declare that they do not dissent from the teaching which they will have to give.

(7) Subject to due safeguards, it should be enacted that if any parent declares that he has reason to fear that a teacher is likely to exercise an influence hostile to his own convictions on matters of religion, the attendance of his child at that school shall cease to be compulsory.

(8) When practicable, and subject to the condition that no religious teaching should be included in the time-table except such as is referred to in paragraph (4), denominational teaching should be permitted for the children whose parents demand it, and at the same time as the undenominational teaching, but it should be given (a) at the charges of the denomination, (b) by a teacher competent to keep good order, who (c) in giving the teaching should not reflect in any way on the tenets or status of any religious body. (d) It should be under the management of a Denominational Board, which should be constituted under a scheme prepared by the religious body in consultation with the Board of Education.

(9) There should be no prizes or inducements of any kind in connection with the religious teaching.

(10) In any case of dispute between the Authority and the religious body about the giving of religious instruction in the school, or as to the arrangements made for it, there should be an appeal to the Board of Education, which should act in consultation with a permanent advisory committee upon which the religious bodies should be represented.

(11) In the interest both of the teachers and of the children, the religious teaching should be given as much as possible by the teachers of the school.

(12) The above guarantees should apply to the religious instruction of the pupil teachers and of scholars in secondary schools.

THIS conception of religion comes to the office of every business man, and utters its command; and what is it? Be honest, fair, and just in the transaction of your business, so that the persons you deal with shall be helped, and not hurt by it. Make business a part of the religious elevation of the world. Instead of a system of scheming and chicanery and outdoing one another, bring business into accord with the divine life of things.—M. J. Savage.

HUNGARY AND AUSTRIA.

I.

UNDER the present gloomy political circumstances it will not be out of place to say a few words on the relationship of Hungary and Austria. I put the two names in this historical order on purpose, and with a perfect right, since Hungary is nine hundred years older than Austria. The territory of Hungary was occupied by the Magyar nation in the middle of the ninth century A.D., and at the end of the tenth century she became a kingdom and has remained so ever since. Under the leadership of elected national kings Hungary was a very strong and influential factor in Europe. In the fourteenth century Hungary in the time of the brave Hunyadi not only saved Europe from the encroachments of the Turks, but became one of the chief leaders of European civilisation. Unfortunately for the Magyar nation, King Matthias' followers on the throne were weak men and poor politicians, and thus the Turks succeeded in annihilating the country's military power, together with the king. This happened in 1526 in the battle of Mohács. Now the Hungarians invited Ferdinand, brother of Charles V. of Germany, to the Hungarian throne, very likely in the hope that his brother would assist them against the Turks. It must be borne in mind that the Hungarian nation made an election in this case also, just as before. She made the elected king take an oath that he would himself keep the laws of the country and defend her constitution and independence. The new king being Emperor of the Austrian principalities, in his person there began a certain connection between the two countries, but this royal family, as such, had no rights whatever to the throne of Hungary, so that Hungary had a full right to elect for her king anybody she preferred. This connection was like that which existed for some time between England and Hanover.

At the St. Louis Exhibition last year, as you know, a large number of the members of the Hungarian Parliament, more than sixty, took part in the Peace Congress. Here Count Apponyi, the greatest orator in Hungary, at the request of the Arts and Science Congress, delivered an address in which he explained the judicial nature of the relations between Hungary and Austria. I accept him as the best authority on this matter, and try to bring the case before the readers of THE INQUIRER, many of whom, I am happy to know, take a great interest in Hungary ever since the great movement in 1848.

Let me begin by stating that in 1686 Hungary conferred her crown on the Hapsburg dynasty with a hereditary right for the male lineage, and in 1723 on the female lineage as well. Of this important transaction history speaks under the name of the Pragmatic Sanction. It will be interesting to see the more important points of the law which decreed the Pragmatic Sanction:—

(1) Hereditary rights to reign as kings in Hungary is conferred on the male and female descendants of the kings Leopold I., Joseph I., and Charles III., to the effect that as long as the above lineage lasts the same person must reign in both countries, Hungary and Austria. The other branches of the Austrian house have no right to succession in Hungary, even if they may have it in Austria.

(2) Notwithstanding the personal union, the independence of the Hungarian crown, and the old liberties of the kingdom, are solemnly recognised and reasserted.

(3) When the above-described lineage becomes extinct, Hungary will use again her ancient right of free election to the throne, irrespective of what Austria or any part of Austria may choose to do in that emergency.

(4) As long as this lineage lasts and the same person reigns in both countries, Hungary and Austria are bound to assist each other against foreign aggression.

It is clearly seen from the above that Hungary's independence and national sovreignty are not touched in the least. The identity of the ruler does not affect the juridical independence of the country. The same person, the Emperor of Austria, has quite different rights in Austria and in Hungary. In Austria he has a power almost absolute, in Hungary his rights are checked and controlled by the will of the nation. There is no possibility of melting these two different prerogatives into one.

There was made a solemn league and covenant, a mutual obligation between the two countries to assist each other against foreign aggression. Hungary entered this compact of mutual defence by an act of her sovereign will, and its execution as well as its interpretation depends entirely on her good faith and discretion. There is no power superior to the public powers of Hungary, entitled to control her, able to force on her what she does not choose to accept or to do. Inasmuch as Joseph II. attempted to subvert the laws of the constitution, it was found necessary to restate the lawful rights of Hungary. This happened in 1790 in Law I. according to which his most holy Majesty was pleased to recognise "that, though the succession of the female branch of the Austrian House in Hungary and her annexed parts, decreed in Laws I. and II. of 1733, belongs, according to the fixed order of succession and in indivisible and inseparable possession, to the same prince whose it is in the other kingdoms and hereditary domain situated in or out of Germany, Hungary with her annexed parts is none the less a free and independent kingdom concerning her whole form of rule (including therein every branch of administration), which means, submitted to no other kingdom or people, but possessed of her own consistence and constitution; therefore she must be ruled by her hereditary and crowned kings, consequently by his holy Majesty also, and by his successors, according to her own laws and customs, and not after the example of other provinces, as is already enacted by the Laws III. 1705, VIII. and XI. of 1741."

The words of the law are so plain, the intention of the whole so clear, that nobody could have any right to bring in question the perfect independence of Hungary. But it may be gathered from the above attempt of Joseph II. that not even the law was strong enough to stop new attempts against the rights of Hungary. Of these I may be permitted, I hope, to speak in another article.

THE HELPFULNESS OF PRAYER.*

BY THE REV. A. W. FOX.

Ask, and it shall be given to you.
MATT. vii. 7.

PRAYER is less a practice to-day among sturdy Protestants than in the past. We do not meet with family prayer as often as was our wont among the members of our own denomination, nor so often as is good for every household. A mistaken view of science and a misunderstanding of evolution may be one reason for this neglect, indifference may be another. One great fact of our being neither the wonders of science nor the exactness of evolution, no, nor indifference itself, can destroy. "God is our Father," who does hear and answer earnest prayer. We may ask injudiciously, but we do receive, not what we asked always, but strength, and comfort, and peace. If Jesus needed to pray, we may be very sure that we need to pray. If Jesus knew that his prayers were answered, will not ours be answered too? Yet Jesus said, speaking of material necessities, "Your Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things."

Our Father knows our needs, before we ask Him for their fulfilment. Why, then, should we pray to Him? An example will serve to show the need of prayer and its answer. It is, of course, a human example, but it thrills with the living spirit of true prayer. A little child has just learned to speak; its first words are "Daddie," "Mammie." When its father comes home from work the little one catches sight of him. In its clear little voice, tuned to love's sweetest melody, it cries "Daddie"; nor will it be content till it is nestling in the strong man's arms. Does not that father know what his child needs? Ah, yes, he knows, if he be a good father, before he is asked. But is not his heart most deeply stirred by his little one's prayer, though it may be uttered in the single word, "Daddie"? "When ye pray, say, Our Father." As the child's relation to its father is deepened by prayer, so is our relation to the Father of all deepened by our prayer to Him. We learn by that means, so simple, so uplifting, to "love Him with all our heart and soul and mind and strength," and through that heavenly love we learn to "love our neighbour as ourself."

Prayer opens the door of communion with God. The man who never prays misses the chief source of spiritual strength. Before we undertake any great work, any great personal effort, we need to get all possible strength. It is not enough for us to have bodily strength. That is God's gift and it is good. We need spiritual strength, that we faint not before our task is done. Many a strong soul lodged in a weakly body has achieved a mighty work. Who of the early Apostles did more to spread Christianity than Paul of Tarsus? Yet, as his letters tell us, his body was but weakly. His resolute soul triumphed over physical infirmities, and he won the crown of immortal service. Prayer was the source of his spiritual strength; in other words, he prayed to God to give him strength, and his prayer was abundantly answered. It were well for all of us, if we could only realise the deep need of earnest, individual, and unselfish prayer.

Many an undertaking, which has started with bright promise, has come to an untimely end, because its promoters have lost heart; they have lost faith in themselves and in their God. The faith would have remained steadfast and their work prospered more if they had felt the need of genuine prayer. If Jenny Lind spent a few moments in prayer before she could sing her best; if Mr. Gladstone could detach himself from all around him and silently pray in the House of Commons before making a great speech, shall not we pray earnestly at this our annual gathering for the true success of our efforts? In our own lives lived between ourselves and our God there are many crises, which would seem small enough to another, which are supremely important to ourselves. How can we hope to meet them bravely if we do not open our hearts to our Father and ask His help? I am not speaking of selfish prayer for wealth, position, and other matters which are of little importance in the Kingdom of God.

We who are met here are earnestly desirous to bring our simple Unitarian faith home to our brothers and sisters. We are confident that what has helped us to live will help others. In no vainglorious or self-seeking spirit, we have no wish to "hide our light under a bushel." We long to let that clear light "so shine, that men, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father which is in heaven." We long to shed some of the light of simple truth and brotherly love upon the pathway of our brothers and sisters, that they may be cheered in doubt and difficulty, and find the way to communion with God. There is no greater work than this on earth. It was the work of Jesus our Master. It is the work which he has left us to do. It is work for God our Father, work for our brothers and sisters. But if it is glorious work, it is no less hard to do. Many have to keep the sacred torch of truth and freedom burning in lonely places. Most of us have deep discouragement and hours of bitter heart-searchings. We need, then, to pray for God's blessing upon all that we undertake for His service, for His help to do our plain duty, for His known and full presence alike in sunshine and in shadow.

It is hard beyond telling to work for God, if we do not in our souls know that we are working with God. That precious knowledge is revealed to us by heart-felt prayer. We may never utter a word; we may simply lay bare our souls before our Father's Spirit. If we really do that, we shall find cheer in our despondency and hope amid our disappointments. Our trust will return to us established like some strong tower upon the Rock of Ages. We shall feel the comfortable shelter of our Father's boundless love. He will be with us, as He was before we prayed to Him; but our prayer will show us that great fact. Before we had merely belief, after we shall have knowledge. Communion with God will no longer be ours at rare seasons, but at all times. We shall know His protecting care, we shall thrill to His inspiration. Our work will be no less hard, but our strength will be greater. With cheerful confidence, we shall do what is given to us, doubting nothing that the seed sown in darkness and tears will ripen to golden grain fit for our Father's garner.

That is what prayer, when it is prayer, and not the glib utterance of devotional commonplaces, can and will do for us. May we, then, pray to our Father as the disciples to their Master and ours, "Teach us to pray, as Jesus also taught his disciples." Then will our wills be strengthened, our aims enlarged, our work blessed, and our spirits purified, so that "we shall see God." "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth, and to him that knocketh it is opened." Be this our practice in life, and may our Father help us to do His holy will now and for ever.

ANGLICAN CHURCH HISTORY.

THIS little book* of 170 pages can make no pretence to dealing adequately with even the Church History of a very important and intricate period of English development. It is, for instance, inferior in plan and finish to the well-known little volume "The Church and the Puritans," by Mr. Wakeman, in the Epochs of Church History Series. It consists of four lectures delivered by Dr. Plummer in 1904, before various Church of England Societies, in Devonshire, Bristol, and Durham, and reprinted, in response to numerous requests, in form almost unaltered from that in which they were spoken. Hence, there is often a bluntness and lack of polish in the style which is unexpected in a printed volume, and the italicising of the numerous words or clauses upon which the lecturer laid emphasis produces a curious effect, reminding one of college note-books underscored for final revision before examination. The lectures, however, are by no means without force or interest; and, by virtue of the very incompleteness of his scheme of treatment, Dr. Plummer is able to give emphasis to several important points (such as the interplay of Scottish and English politics), which are often neglected for want of space by the ordinary manuals on the period. There is also an attempt, by no means entirely unsuccessful, to be judicial and impartial in treating of one of the most highly controversial chapters of English history. The first lecture, "Counter-Reformation v. Ultra-Reformation," 1575-1603, may be described as a typical moderate Anglican view of the "Elizabethan Settlement" of religion. By presenting Romanism in the guise of pure reaction, and Puritanism (without any adequate definition of that much-abused word) in the guise of pure revolution, it is not difficult to show up the Anglicanism even of Elizabeth, James I and Charles I, with all its trimming, scheming, tyranny, and bigotry, in bright and glowing colours. There is little or no discussion of ultimate questions—the authority of the Crown, the Church, the Bible, or the conscience, in matters of religious belief and practice. The assumption, throughout, appears to be that Anglicanism, as by Tudor and Stuart law established, is the religion of all sensible persons—a heaven-appointed middle way between the dreadful extremes of Popery and an anarchical dissent. But this is rather too complacent and naïve a view to satisfy the demands of historical science. A church which, as Lord Chatham said, "has a Calvinistic creed, an Arminian clergy, and a Popish liturgy," must continue to pay, as it has had all along to pay, a heavy price for its studied and politic ambiguity. That price has been, and is, a loss of moral power. Elizabeth may have captured, as it has been claimed she did, "the neutral nucleus of the nation." But, it may be asked, is that the best material for spiritual efficiency? As a matter of fact, the Elizabethan and Caroline "Settlements" mark only the beginning and culmination of profound unsettlement in the religious life of this nation. The steady growth of Nonconformity, until now its numbers are in excess of those in the Established Church itself, is the best criticism upon the complacency of Anglican historians and apologists. We have paid heavily, as a nation, for a Reformation which, as it has been well said: "had no apostle, no prophet," but which owed its origin and completion to Tudor and Stuart despots and their courtly intimates.

* "English Church History; from the death of Archbishop Parker to the death of Charles I., 1575-1649." By the Rev. Alfred Plummer, M.A., D.D. (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 1904. 3s. net.)

Dr. Plummer's three other lectures deal with the reigns of James I. and Charles I., and form a capital running commentary on some of the main events. The author is quite frank in his judgment of the Stuarts for not seeing the signs of the times and responding to the needs of the country. But, while Charles's folly is roundly condemned, it is not pointed out that Anglicanism also suffered shipwreck, and was in the same boat with him. The chief weakness of this little book is that, with all its efforts to be fair, we get no light from it upon the real significance of Puritanism, or any adequate attempt to estimate its leading representatives, the sources of its greatness, or its services to the world. And this is not good for the Diocesan Church Reading Societies, and the like, to which these lectures were delivered.

Is it quite hopeless to plead for unsectarian lay lectures on ecclesiastical history, especially before sectarian audiences? Things might be very different in our church life and relations if only we could insure a scientific study of Church history. And, how would it be, in writing of such a tangled period as this, to adopt always Harnack's method, and ask of each Church or Denomination the searching questions: (1) "What did it achieve?" (2) "What are its characteristics?" (3) "How has the Gospel held its own in it?"

THE TWO STONES.

I.

Tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything.

THERE were once two stones. They lay upon a rocky shelf above a river, which flowed down a limestone valley, the steep sides of which were clothed with fir and mountain ash. They were good stones on the whole, that is to say they stayed in their places, and did what is expected from young pebbles. They were happy too, very happy. The ledge was smooth, except for a few crannies often filled with clear water, in which birds would dip their beaks or cool their feet. Winds wafted scents from heather and thyme upon the hill-tops. Sun and rain brought alternate warmth and cold, and the two stones, though they remonstrated with the raindrops for pattering down upon them so hard, generally felt thankful afterwards, when the sunshine, but for the wet, would have made the ledge uncomfortably hot.

Hard by rested a boulder. He was a fine old fellow with a remarkably shapely figure of some ten or twelve feet in height. Grass and reeds covered his feet, and he was crowned with red geranium. No human being knew exactly when or how he came there. Some of his story the boulder told to the learned men, who came tapping his sides with their hammers, but most people passed him by with a respectful gaze, while the vulgar stared, and tried in vain to cut their names upon him. Among the rocks around he was reputed very good and wise, and the stones would have been afraid of him had not his exceeding hard outside been softened by his worn, grey look, and relieved by a certain brightness. When the rocks remarked on this last feature, he used to say, with a half sigh, half smile, "Yes, I've had many rubs in life, but it is astonishing what taking them the right way will do. Why, actually the more rubs you get, the brighter you grow."

He was a kindly old boulder, and the two stones liked nothing better than to listen to his chat. To begin with, he was a foreigner, though he had lost much of the mottled appearance which distinguished him from his neighbours:

"I came many years ago from the hills—'fells' they were called in those parts—far beyond the top of the valley," he once told them. "Times are changed since then, and places are changed. The hills were covered with snow, this valley was only half-made and bare, and instead of a stream of water, a great ice-river shifted down it. There were many such as I, who started from the old 'fell' country, but they are all scattered now. Oh! that ice! I thought it never would stop. We travelled a long way, and had a rough time of it before it melted, but I began to see the good of our journey before we had done, and that helped me along, and now as I lie on this soft grass, the trees above my head, and the valley green and broad, and full of life, I see more good and understand more clearly."

Both the stones wondered what it was that caused the boulder such painful recollection, and had perplexed him sorely, for they had not heard his speech about the rubs in life. They could not help thinking how delightful it would be to travel as he had done. Said one of them, "It is so dull on this ledge. We want to be stirring." "Your time will come, sooner than you expect," replied their friend. "I have learnt that wonders and changes never cease. We are all put here to help some great plan, and every change seems to fit into it. You'll find out some day what you are for. You are changing. Something has taken your first hard corners off—the sun and rain perhaps. You are young pebbles, and doubtless do not understand when I speak thus. It is a long time before we realise what marvels we are, and that each of us has a corner to fill in this wonder-world." And the boulder nestled contentedly in his greenery, smiling as the sun caught his polished sides.

The stones did not understand, but their time came. The rain grew more frequent, and filled the becks, so that they streaked the fells with foaming water-courses, which flowed into the river. One stormy morning, when a grey mist hung about everything, the river rose above the shelf on which the stones lay, and swept them off. They had just time to shout good-bye before they sank. Was it the thick air that made the farewell sound somewhat sad to their aged friend, or was it that the two stones did not find stir and bustle quite so pleasant after all as the quiet ledge, and thought fondly of it now they were leaving it? "Courage, my young pebbles!" he said, and then he leaned among the grass and reeds, and thought of his young boulder days and the far-off granite fells.

But if the stones felt chilled at the first plunge, they soon began to enjoy the newness of the scene in which they found themselves. Down among darting fish and swaying strands of water-plants they had sped to the bottom of the river, and now mingled in a strange medley of hundreds of other stones more or less like themselves in substance, but of all shapes and sizes, shoving and jostling, chafing and chasing, moving, always moving, but slowly for all their bustle, down the river bed. How exciting it was! A push here, a bump there, and, the way being clear, off down the stream, then push and bump again. One of the pebbles elbowed his way so vigorously that his companions often complained of him for a rude, awkward fellow. Occasionally he received harder knocks than he cared for. However, often as not, he had his own angles to thank for them. By and by his own bumps and his neighbours' complaints became fewer, and what do you think was the reason? He was puzzled till he met his brother, from whom he had been separated, and each found the other changed. Each was rounder and smoother "Just like the boulder," one of them remarked. "It must have been something like this rubbing and continual slipping along in the ice-river, but much worse, for this stir is rather interesting. It is curious that the harder we grind the easier we get along. I wonder what it is all for, and where we are going. Anyhow, it seems best not to shirk the grind, to take the water and stones with one's smooth end foremost, and to look ahead ready for the next move."

MAZZINI.

ONE other centenary we ought to have called to mind last week. On June 22, 1805, JOSEPH MAZZINI was born at Genoa, and died on March 10, 1872, a man of faith, worthy to be remembered with JAMES MARTINEAU and FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN, the greatest of Italian patriots in the last century, whose life was given to the cause of freedom for his people and unity for his country. "I have no hope for any European revolution," MARTINEAU wrote in 1852 to NEWMAN, "except Mazzini's."

"He breathed a soul into democracy," is JOHN MORLEY'S judgment. "MAZZINI," said ARNOLD TOYNBEE, "is the true teacher of our age." What did he teach? That men must hold fast to a living faith in GOD, and be concerned not so much for their rights as their duties:

"Working-men! Brothers!" so he pleaded, "when CHRIST came and changed the face of the world, he spoke not of rights to the rich who needed not to achieve them; nor to the poor, who would doubtless have abused them in imitation of the rich. He spoke not of interest nor of utility, to a people whom interest and utility had corrupted. He spoke of Duty, of Love, of Sacrifice, and of Faith; and he said that they should be first among all, who had contributed most by their labour to the good of all. . . . Preach duty to the classes above you, and fulfil as far as in you lies your own. Preach Virtue, Sacrifice, and Love, and be yourselves virtuous, loving, and ready for self-sacrifice."

Not long after CARLYLE had published "Sartor Resartus" with its Gospel of the "Everlasting Yea," MAZZINI, living as an exile in London, became his friend; but he had already won his own victory without human aid, and by the way of self-renunciation:

While still at college at Genoa, MAZZINI renounced his early aspirations after literary fame, and consecrated his life to the cause of his people, then divided and oppressed by various unworthy governments. First imprisoned, and then driven into exile at the age of 25, he began a long career of patient, fearless, and most unselfish service, as a political writer and an organiser of popular movements. His great ideal was a united Italy, his watchword "GOD and the people." He set himself to waken in his fellow-countrymen a sense of their high national destiny, of what they might be and do as a free and united people.

It was after six years of such unwearied labours, when an exile in Switzerland in 1836, that the storm of doubt and sorrow broke upon him, of which he has left a very touching account. After the failure of more than one effort and the disappointment of many hopes, the friends whom he had most trusted began to look coldly upon him, to suspect him of unworthy motives, and to desert the cause to which he was so entirely devoted. Then it was that the dreadful fear took possession of him, that perhaps he was mistaken, that after all there might be no hope for Italy, and it was not (as he had felt) a divine mission to which he had given himself; that the sacrifice was in vain, and he was guilty of the blood of many who had already died for the cause. Perhaps there was some lurking of personal ambition in his heart which blinded him and had led him astray. To a man of most noble, affectionate, and sensitive nature, such thoughts were maddening; and he was brought to the very verge of despair, which threatened, as he says, to end in madness or the selfish death of the suicide. But one morning he awoke to find that his mind was tranquil, and calmer thoughts found their way to his heart. Nothing he saw could excuse despair. He had been confused by the misery of wounded affection and disappointed hopes. But a man has simply to be true to himself. Life is a mission, and duty its highest law. He may not claim for himself any of the joys of life, but thankfully taking all that is given, whether in joy or sorrow, must do his own work.

Alone, as he recorded years afterwards, looking back upon that time, MAZZINI came to his better self, through the thought of GOD and human progress and duty. He found not happiness, indeed, but peace, for he learned to suffer without rebellion, and to live calmly and in harmony with his own spirit. "Never from that time," he says, "have I for an instant allowed myself to think that my own unhappiness could in any way influence my actions. . . : Whether the sun shine with the serene splendour of an Italian morn, or the leaden corpse-like hue of the northern mist be above us, I cannot see that it changes our duty. GOD dwells above the earthly heaven, and the holy stars of faith and the future still shine within our own souls, even though their light consume itself unreflected as the sepulchral lamps."

The lofty spirit of MAZZINI, and the permanent value of his teaching as an inspirer and strengthener of faith, are well indicated in these closing sentences of Mr. BOLTON KING'S life of the great patriot in the "Temple Biographies":—

"He loved to commune with those of his own spiritual kin,—DANTE, SAVONAROLA, CROMWELL,—men who had the same undoubting faith in the righteousness of their cause and their fellow-work with GOD—men, it may be, one-sided and intellectually incomplete, but gifted with the power to do great things and lift up life. And so great principles and nobleness of aim carried him through a series of practical mistakes, and left his life to be a permanent enriching of the race. What if he dreamed dreams, that for generations yet may be no more than dreams? What if his mental ken reached not to all the knowledge of the age? What if he marred his work by mistakes and miscalculations? His errors have passed; his intellectual limitations can be supplied. His was the rarer and the greater part, to lift men out of the low air of common life up to the heights, where thought is larger, and life runs richer, and the great verities are seen, undimmed by self and sophistry. The idealist is still mankind's best friend; and he does most for the race, who purges its spiritual vision, and breathes into cold duty, till it becomes a thing of life and passion and power. Greater still is he who is not idealist only, but saint and hero, and in his life bears witness to the truth he teaches. Such saint and hero and idealist MAZZINI was, and while men and women live, who would be true to themselves and to their call, who value sacrifice and duty above power and success, so long will there be those who will love him and be taught by him."

MIGHTY powers are at work in the world. Who can stay them? God's word has gone forth, and it "cannot return to Him void." A new comprehension of the Christian spirit—a new reverence for humanity, a new feeling of brotherhood and of all men's relation to the common Father—this is among the signs of our times. We see it; do we not feel it? Before this all oppressions are to fall. Society, silently pervaded by this, is to change its aspect of universal warfare for peace. The power of selfishness, all grasping and seemingly invincible, is to yield to this diviner energy. —Channing.

THE CAPABLE UNEMPLOYED.

Two recent events have served again to remind the public of the grave personal and social mischief involved in the permanent existence of a class of men willing and able to work, but unable to gain employment. These events are the second reading of the Bill in the House of Commons by a majority of 228 to 11, and the march from Leicester to London of a large deputation from the unemployed operatives of the Midland town. The problem is not a new one. It became very prominent in 1894, and thereafter was largely forgotten until the severe distress of last winter again forced it into attention. During several months it has been a subject of general and anxious discussion. And from these discussions one truth has emerged—unemployment is a complex condition. The general distinction which has been drawn, is into the unemployable and the unemployed. It is entirely with the second class, the men who could and would work, that we are now concerned.

The Bill which the Government are carrying through Parliament is a recognition—timid and superficial, if you will—of the responsibility of society to this class. On the toil of the workers the wealth of the country depends, and the country owes it to the workers that they shall not be left destitute. Such is the general principle. We may accept with satisfaction the announcement, during the second reading debate, of some improvements on the Bill as originally drafted; as, e.g., the resolution to make it applicable to the whole country, or at least to all the industrial centres. But one grave defect remains. While part of the cost of administration falls on the public funds, the wages paid to the people employed are to come from philanthropic subscribers. Now, the experience of last winter has shown how unreliable and insufficient is such a source of income. The country does not seem, even yet, to be alive to the extent and gravity of the situation. Periods of unemployment are a necessary incident of our industrial system.

To emphasise that truth was the object of the march from Leicester. Those men from the boot and other factories were standard working men. They were, in a sense, picked men, not idlers, not wastrels. During previous years they had worked; they were ready to work still. Simply, they were not wanted because trade was slack. And Leicester is a type. What has happened there is illustrative of the condition everywhere. What the men of Leicester had to tell us was of a national result of a general industrial cause which calls for a national remedy.

And the remedy—what is it?

A complete answer would carry us far into a study of the structure of society. But in the first place, and on the surface, we may say, continuous and useful labour for all at fair wages. The work that waits to be done is immense. Vast tracts of country want planting with trees; the canals need to be repaired, deepened, extended, brought into general use, and under public control. There are some millions of people who need boots and other clothes, to say nothing of better houses and sufficient food. All our elementary schools are absurdly understaffed—a whole army of teachers is needed. It is impossible to give a list of the socially useful works which are waiting to be done.

But what results might be expected if such a policy were initiated? To answer that we must ask a further question. Why has trade been so slack? In part as a result of the South African War; partly because it always is so at intervals of about ten years. In fact, so regular is the period of depression, that the late Professor Jevons sought to connect trade crises with sun spots. But also in a large measure trade becomes bad as a result of the previous poverty of the wage earners. The expenditure of the working classes is for the most part very regular. Every increase of wage means buying more boots, bread, meat, fruit, or whatever it may be. Every decrease of wage means a diminution. If the engineers of a town go on short time they buy less clothes, and the clothing trades go on short time. So the evil spreads and spreads. The remedy is to be found in regular employment at good wages. Let the community but employ the men who are without work, and those men, with their increased spending power, will buy things of utility for themselves and their families. Doing this they help to keep all other trades going. In other words, the cause of industrial depression is not over production, but under consumption.

One other result of setting the unemployed at work may be mentioned. The existence of surplus labour keeps down wages. If several men compete for one job the price paid is naturally a low one. When we arrive at the one-job-one-man ideal, it will no longer be possible to keep wages at a starvation level as they are to-day for unskilled and agricultural labour. In two ways, then, we may expect that as we lessen the number of the unemployed we shall also improve the conditions and the wages of the employed.

I do not, of course, expect any ultimate remedy for poverty in the timid proposals which have hitherto been submitted. Before we can hope for that, we have to deal very searchingly with the needs, not only of the unemployed, but also of the underpaid. Behind the immediate schemes for finding work for those who are discarded by the competitive labour market, lie other and more far reaching demands. The curse of industry is twofold: no wage for some, too low a wage for many. Well, the question of the minimum wage raised by the great coal strike is only sleeping. It will return on us. Another ideal has to do with securing the land of the country for the use of those who will work it. We know that properly worked the land could amply supply our whole population. But before the land can be properly worked, brought under the hands of the workers, it will have to be socialised. Such reflections as these are ultimates. For the present there is no inclination to go so far. But the importance of the present position with regard to the unemployed seems to me to consist in this, that it points in this direction, and that it is at least a beginning of the national organisation of industry.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE

THE annual meetings were held at Moreton on Wednesday, June 21. In the morning the religious service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper, and the sermon was preached by the Rev J. J. Wright from the text: "Ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times?" (Matt. xvi. 3). The sermon made such an impression that the Assembly unanimously resolved to print it, in order to circulate it widely. We, therefore, now only briefly epitomise it.

THE SERMON.

The changing face of the sky, and our hasty reading of it, said the preacher, may well represent our busy, wandering attention to the superficial things of life, whereas, to discern the "signs of the times"—the significance of the human changes amid which we live—is to be able to fix our minds, more and more, on the things that really matter. And unless and until we can do that we can never have the faith and the courage, the serenity, the hopefulness, and the resoluteness, which become us as believers in God and man. The blindness of the Pharisees and Sadducees to the moral and spiritual significances of the times Christ attributed to their hypocrisy; but the bulk of our spiritual blindness is by no means the result of hypocrisy. Dulness will blind us as much as doubleness. And our dulness may arise, not from the stagnancy of our minds, but from the very activity of our minds. We may be so terribly preoccupied with the immediate things as to be more or less blind to the eternal things. The root and sap and life of this Assembly and the Churches it represents is this: our spiritual interest and hope in man, our spiritual effort and prayer for man, and, above all, our spiritual confidence as to what God and man working together can do, here and now, to establish the Kingdom of heaven on earth. Harnack briefly defines Christianity thus:—"The Christian religion is something simple and sublime. It means one thing and one thing only—Eternal Life in the midst of Time, by the strength and under the eyes of God." That is the only life which befits a human being, for it is life at its best; life moved and guided by the simple principles of faith, hope, and love; life lived in God, for man, and with the spirit of Christ. The fact that the very words Religious Education have nearly lost all sense of charm or of spiritual suggestion, and have gathered into themselves almost every sense of bitterness and suggestion of strife, is a sign of the times which, if not ominous, is certainly momentous. On the one hand we have a relentless ecclesiastical activity insisting in the schools on an ecclesiasticism which it calls Religion; on the other hand, we have a swelling antagonism to this which cries, with growing effect, "Hands off!" Yes, scotch, and kill if you can, all ecclesiasticism ursurping the place and power of Religion; but that is only destruction, necessary destruction of the false and injurious, if you please, but where does the true and wholesome come in? Where does Religious Education come in, which the rising generation can no more do without—nay, can less do without—than it can do without Reading, Writing, and Arithmetic? A second sign of the times is the general weakening in the sense of parental responsibility, and, coupled with this, the increasing absence of parental control. We see painful evidences of this on almost every hand. The world just now is having sadly to suffer from, or has roughly to punish, many a youth whom simple and natural parental control could and should have trained up to average decency. Thirdly, in the careful judgment of John Morley, there has taken place, within our own time, a considerable decay of real reverence, not only for things higher and more permanent than man, but for man himself, even at his best. This leads to two other signs of the times. According to Mr. L. T. Hobhouse, in his "Democracy and Reaction," there is a reaction against humanitariansm "which is by no means peculiar to our own country or to the sphere of politics. It is common to the civilised world, and penetrates every department of life and thought." "Humanitarianism is now dismissed as sentimentality. . . . Indeed, the bare conception of right in public matters has lost its force, and given place to political 'necessity' and 'reasons of State.' Hence human wrongs and human sufferings do not move us as they did." The fifth sign of the times is expressed by the same author as follows:—"The decay in vivid and profound religious beliefs." "Humanitarianism having lost its hold, the resulting temper is a good-natured scepticism, not only about the other world, but also about the deeper problems and higher interests of this world." In his two memorable articles on Mr. Hobhouse's book, John Morley indicates the sixth sign of the times. He says the root of the whole matter is "that an epidemic of unbelief has run through our Western world—unbelief in institutions, in principles, churches, parliaments, books, divinities, worst of all and at the root of all—in man himself!" "Such epidemics [of unbelief] are familiar in the annals of mankind; they are part of the terrible Manicheeism of human history; the everlasting struggle between the principles of good and evil." The preacher did not think these signs indicated an essential worsening of human nature, or of any actual disappearing of Religion. What we want is a deeper, clearer vision into the heart of things as they truly are. The theory of evolution is, of course, the best explanation of Nature that man has yet arrived at. But we now see that, good as this theory is, when thoroughly understood and applied to Nature, it has been easily possible, in social, industrial, national, and international life, to utilise the terms and ideas of the theory for cynical, selfish, shameless, and inhuman ends. If humans are only animals, if the weakest must go to the wall; if, whatever happens, the fit—i.e., the man with the advantage—must survive, then where do any moral rights come in? and what may the man not do who has the power? In that reading of evolution, and its animalistic application to humanity, we have the central cause of most of the signs of the times just looked at—not only the decay of humanitarianism and of reverence, but perhaps, in the main, even the waning sense of parental responsibility. We are on the verge of a more spiritual age. Once again, in human history, the attempt to "run" human life upon a materialistic basis, even with the air of science about it, to do without ethics, and to discard all spiritual inlook and outlook, has proved, in our own day, a serious failure, and utterly unsatisfying to the human heart by which men truly live. The great fact is becoming clearer and clearer every day that what we have called Mind and Spirit are the abiding, ever-working Realities in and through all appearances. The man of to-day is, in the main, a practical man, and he will arrive at the spiritual through the ethical rather than through the metaphysical. The chief thing calling for practical consideration is the real Religious Education of Children and Young People. It is in the young human life of any period that all the hope and promise—or otherwise—of the immediate future is to be found. Religion is the supreme necessity of the rising generation. We so believe in Reading and Writing and Technologies and Languages that we engage the best of trained teachers for them; but what of Religion? of Ethics? of Conduct? Religion will not come by chance any more than Arithmetic; and yet how casual are our endeavours to teach our children the Art of Right Living! It is a most difficult art, both to learn and to teach, for it includes a sense of God, of His good laws, of obedience to these, and responsibility to Him; of the joy of duty, the loveliness of goodness, the charm of Christlikeness; while it always involves the art of right living within oneself, of right living in relation to others, of right living in relation to our country and the world, of right living in relation to Nature and to God. The most needful and yet the most neglected thing, in the world of teaching and learning. If it is not too fond a dream that we of our group of Churches—we that are so free to make new departures, so unbound that we can always, if we will, adapt ourselves and our methods to the changing conditions of the times—taking Religion as the supreme necessity of life, and taking the rising generation as of the first and foremost importance, should, perchance, so reduce or re-arrange the incessant demands which, as adults, we make on our ministers; perhaps so alter the emphasis of our religious work as to deal more largely with the young; and, it may even be, so train men in our Colleges that possibly those who need the minister most—our children and young people—will ever be his main charge, and have the first and largest call upon his time and talents; then we may, indeed, do, for the Kingdom of God and the good of man, such a work as has not yet been accomplished. Would it not be worth while for our congregations to make it their determined business that those who come to their schools should get as they can get nowhere else, a sound and practical religious education? Would it not be easily possible, were ministers either provided with trained assistants or relieved of the grim demand for two sermons a week for adults—whether they are there or not—to put at least half their best strength into the special religious instruction of young people? Let parents, too, remember that "a father's sincerity often determines for life the ethics of his boy's theology; and a mother's love the depth and horizon of his faith in the Infinite Goodness." We must think not only of our homes and schools and churches, for there is also a call upon us to save and nurture the starved and stunted souls who are all around us in the outside world.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The afternoon business meeting was presided over by the President, Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, who, in the course of his address, said he was sure their Churches had been doing their best to meet the various social, moral, and religious difficulties which had beset them. He referred sympathetically to the deaths of the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and F. R. Elliott, and expressed great pleasure at the return of the Rev. H. E. Dowson in renewed health and vigour. He thought the Churches ought to make more use of their Presidents during their terms of office. They might ask them to be present at the annual meetings of their District Associations. He extended sincere congratulations to the Unitarian Home Missionary College on the celebration of its jubilee, and expressed a belief that its future achievements would prove an honourable sequel to its past endeavour. He hoped that all prejudice and misunderstanding would soon completely vanish, and that henceforth the two colleges would work hand in hand, with different methods perhaps, and yet ever in the same spirit, engaged in a joint work. The Assembly had recognised in its reports on public questions the need for bringing religion into every department of life, and he thought more might be done by the churches collectively in the way of comparing notes for public effort. In alluding to the section of the Report dealing with education, the President said he could not but differ from its pessimistic conclusions.

It could not be denied that the new Act was defective, and that it might have been much better. But it did at least bring elementary and secondary education under one control; it did at least provide a public education authority whose first duty it was to provide the necessary funds, the poverty of private and irresponsible managers being thus no longer the measure of what could be provided. He was absolutely satisfied that more could be made of the Act than had yet been done. The education authority in his district felt that they had been struggling with extraneous details of administration, and could only now attempt to meet the real demands of education itself. He could not help thinking that the difficulties of administering the Act had been greatly increased by those who—however, conscientiously and earnestly—were opposing sectarianism.

Report on Public Questions.

The Committee's report on public questions noted with gratification that at the recent Free Church Conference in Manchester some attention was paid to the matter of the social life of the people connected with the churches. Dr. Horton and others presented an ideal which had much to be said in its praise, though its realisation was open to some grave dangers. In these days of eager pleasure-seeking and open indifference it was a matter of great importance to oversee the amusements of young people. No institution was more fitted to do this work than the Christian Church. The danger to be avoided was that the recreational side of a church's work should thrust out the far more important spiritual side. In some respects the Wesley Guild fulfilled the task in the soundest way.

Dealing with the subject of education, the Committee pointed to three results of the Education Act which had been revealed during the past year. The most striking of these was the enormous increase of the education rates everywhere. In the main, this increased expenditure was the measure of the former inefficiency of the Voluntary-schools and the price we had to pay for the maintenance of the dual system in elementary education. That so much money, was being spent on education would be matter for rejoicing if the conditions guaranteed sound principles of public finance and proper economy. It was, however, the violation of both these conditions which made the burden intolerable. This vast additional expenditure carried with it, for the most part, no effective public control. The denominations had transferred the cost of their schools, but had retained their former control practically unimpaired. The added expenditure made not so much for educational efficiency as for denominational rivalry. The second fact made clear was the incapacity of the authority for the discharge of the administrative duties imposed upon it. Few people realised how seriously the Act of 1892 had destroyed local interest and control, and how perilously it had concentrated authority in remote and unsuitable centres. The third point to be noticed was the constant encroachment of the sectarian system on what should be the neutral territory of public finance.

The report also alluded to the growing evils of gambling. The natural impulse to look to legislation for remedies was pointed out, and it was said that doubtless there were amendments to existing statutes which it would be well to press for. At the same time it must not be forgotten that legislation which outran the average conscience of the community always tended to remain ineffective. There were admirable laws in existence which were largely inoperative, for this reason. What was required was a more persistent and sustained attempt to educate the public conscience.

On the question of housing reform, also, the Committee spoke of the necessity of a well-informed public opinion, and expressed approval of the lectures which had been delivered in Ancoats and other centres on this subject.

The problem of the unemployed was dealt with at considerable length. The opinion was expressed that the permissive clauses of the Government Bill needed to be made compulsory throughout the country. The provision of a ½d. or even a 1d. rate, coupled with voluntary subscriptions, was hopelessly inadequate alike to the importance of the subject and to the resolve of the nation to remove such a reproach.

The reception of the report was moved by the Rev. T. P. SPEDDING, who said he hoped it would be understood by the outside public that the chairman, in his remarks on the Education Act, had been expressing his own opinoin, and that the bulk of Unitarians were not prepared to quietly sit down under this Act just because it gave a "one authority"—an authority which was breaking down everywhere.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. R. ROBINSON, and carried unanimously.

The Revs. W. Reynolds, H. B. Smith, J. Ruddle, J. C. Hirst, and Messrs. T. F. Robinson and D. Healey addressed the meeting on subjects referred to in the report. The President, in reply to Mr. Spedding's remarks, said he thought it hardly neccessary to state that he was opposed to sectarianism in education.

The Missionary report was adopted on the motion of the Rev. F. W. FOX, seconded by Mr. T. F. ROBINSON.

The following resolution moved by Rev. C. PEACH, on behalf of Mr. James R. Beard, was carried unanimously:—

"That, having regard to the great services rendered to the Churches and Sunday Schools in the province by the Unitarian Home Missionary College, this meeting of the Provincial Asembly of Lancashire and Cheshire expresses its best wishes for the success of the College Jubilee Memorial Fund, and commends it to the Churches in the Province."

The Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS was elected president of the Assembly for the year, and the Rev. John Moore was elected supporter.

Luncheon and tea were daintily served in the commodious schools, and the whole day's proceedings were of a very hopeful and inspiring character.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held.

Mr. JOHN DENDY, who presided, referring to the ancient founders of the Assembly, said that to-day the theological outlook was different; there was a great deal that they no longer held in common. One of their present problems was what to do with the liberty they possessed? They ought not to consider that when liberty was attained all had been attained. Unless a wise and good use were made of it, it might almost be better not to have it at all. Their ancestors thought their doctrines rested on a firm foundation when based on the Bible. Those doctrines had undergone great changes; and the time had come when the most difficult problem had to be faced, for the whole question of basing the religious life upon any set of doctrines had been challenged and was likely to come to an end. He had doubt about the future of religion; but it would have to put aside questions of mere doctrine and found itself upon the abiding realities of experience common to all men—love, duty, beauty, truth—and finally gaining out of these the great experience of God. They must trust themselves to the great intuitions, watching for the unvarying realities of life, and by means of them rising to a higher conception of deity, speaking of Him no longer from Trinitarian or Unitarian point of view, but in faith and love, crying out, "Holy, Holy, Holy. Thou alone art Holy. There is none perfect besides Thee."

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS delivered an address on "The need and advantage of a closer union of congregations." He thought our arrangements had been entirely individualistic, when they ought to have been collective. The unit should be not the individual, but the congregation: The only people who did our work were a few committees. We were lacking in cohesion; and were consequently in a position of less strength and hope than we could wish: Many of our institutions were governed by committees that were co-opted; the authority which gave them existence no longer knew anything about them. He referred to the Ministers' Pension scheme as an illustration. There should be a national conference on the lines of the Provincial Assembly, without closed doors or doctrine as its basis, but on the common basis of religious worship only.

Mr. J. S. MACKIE, of Burnley, read a paper on "What Unitarians should seek first." The form of religion known as Unitarian was to him the truest and best calculated to secure the progress we desired. It was a word which had been made significant, which had been up-lifted and sanctified by the prayers, aspirations, trials, and joys of some of the noblest men and women. It is for us to read more and more into the name until it becomes the greatest name in the world. Are we worthy of our trust? Do we live up to our gospel? Are we touching the hearts of men and women? Do we so influence the character of national and municipal administration as to counteract vice and purify life? We are doing these things only in a limited degree. In times without number, men whose hearts were right have triumphed over all difficulties. How can we be true to ourselves and God if we do not try to spread the knowledge of that which we deem truth? Are we prepared to forfeit worldly success and even happiness in forwarding the religion we profess? We must be self-sacrificing in our religious service. How many men plead the pressure of public duties as an excuse for their omission of duties connected with their Church! Men will spend £50 in contesting a municipal election who will give nothing in support of a religious institution. Both rich and poor are tainted with a niggardly habit when confronted by the needs of their religious community; and the rich are the greater sinners. He doubted whether the ministers were any better than the laity in this respect. If 300 specially trained ministers failed to make Unitarianism a power in the land it was time for the laymen to put their backs into the work in dead earnest. The best men minister to wealthy churches, while the churches most needing them have to put up with mediocrity. All Unitarians should seek first the Kingdom of God, and sacrifice every other thing whatever.

The PRESIDENT felt called upon to say a word of criticism on Mr. Mackie's paper: He had the privilege of working in connection with two of our funds, had been on the Committees of two Colleges, was the son of one minister and the grandson of another, and he could not resist uttering his protest against Mr. Mackie's wholesale condemnation of ministers and their motives.

The Rev. N. ANDERSON spoke on "The New Rationalism," and thus was brought to a close one of the most interesting of Provincial Assembly gatherings in recent years.

The following members were elected to serve on the Committee for the ensuing year:—The Revs. G. Evans, T. B. Evans, A. W. Fox, C. Peach, C. Roper, T. P. Spedding, S. A. Steinthal, J. J. Wright; Messrs. J. R. Beard, H. P. Greg, P. Leigh, D. A. Little, J. H. Pimley, R. Robinson, G. W. R. Wood, and S. B. Worthington.

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS.

THE Annual Meetings of this Association were held in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast, on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 20 and 21.

On Tuesday evening, after prayer by Principal Gordon, and the calling of the roll by the Rev. James Kennedy, hon. secretary, a paper by Dr. John Campbell was read by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, the author being unfortunately prevented from being present by the illness of his wife.

THE SPIRIT OF THE REFORMATION.

Dr. Campbell's paper was entitled, "The Spirit of the Reformation: a plea for increased activity in the Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church." It noted how, in spite of the splendid efforts of the Christian Churches and organisations, the lives of the majority of men and women were only partially influenced by their religion. It was true that a good many people were deeply affected by religious emotion, and endeavoured in their daily lives to conform to the Christian example; and it was also true that a very large number of their fellow-creatures followed the observances of religion in accordance with social convention and fashion rather than from any deep inward conviction, exhibiting but little of the Christian spirit in their daily conduct. In addition to these two classes, there was a vast army composed of those who had never been brought under any permanent religious influence, and for whom neither the principles nor the practice of Christianity had any meaning. Had the fear of criticism not been allowed to paralyse the Churches of the Reformation in their effect upon the lives of men? The great fundamental truths revealed to them in the sacred Scriptures and the precepts taught to them by Christ were eternal verities. No criticism could shake them, no study weaken them. The priest might fear that the doctrinal setting which his Church had woven round them might be broken by criticism or research, but he could not believe in the Word of God, and imagine that its eternal truths could be overthrown or altered by the mind of man. The Bible had nothing to fear from modern science or German criticism, and the grand principles of Christianity could never be shaken, although the creeds and dogmas by which the Churches had endeavoured to teach them might require revision. Such an informal revision had already taken place in the minds of members of the great Protestant organisations, though the written law of the Churches as yet remained unaltered. The theologians of the Free Church of Scotland had advanced to a degree which many of them could hardly realise. The Church of England was at present making an attempt to render its articles of belief such as modern men could accept without reservation, and a great wave of progress had swept over Germany. It might be urged that they should continue to sign creeds and confessions with mental reservations, but to this he objected. Such a course was inconsistent with the principles of the Protestant Reformation, and was fatal to spiritual growth. Why not anew apply the methods of the Reformation and rid the Protestant Churches of doctrines which their members had outgrown, and which restrained the practical influence of the Churches on the lives of men? It was to keep alive the spirit of the Reformation that their own religious denomination existed. As Dr. Marcus Dodds had said, the sure foundation of Protestantism was the response of the individual conscience to the self-evidencing voice of God in Scripture. "The Romanist accepts Scripture as the Word of God because the Church tells him so, but the Protestant accepts it as the Word of God because God told him so." The great principle for which Luther strove favoured individual thought, and tended to multiply small sects, each having its own minor religious distinctions. Both these tendencies were for good, because they kept religion an interesting and important subject for thought in the mind of the ordinary man. Luther's position was, however, far too tolerant and broad to form the basis of a large and powerful ecclesiastical organisation; hence a retrograde step came to be taken, and the creeds and confessions were introduced into the larger Protestant assemblies. In fact, the Churches reverted to the principle of Romanism, which Luther had overthrown, and took upon themselves to impose formulated statements of belief on their adherents. The Churches did not offer their dogmas as expert advice to be taken or rejected by the individual, but insisted upon his accepting their opinion as the only possible one consistent with his salvation, and their experts had not kept their ideas abreast of the times, but continued to offer unchanged the same opinions and advice as they gave three hundred years ago.

Had the Reformed Churches not sought to impose their creeds and confessions on men and been content to use them as a means of teaching the fundamental truths of the Gospel, no great harm would have been done. But when subscription to a hard-and-fast form of confession of faith was made obligatory in any Church, that Church had thereby lost its hold on the very foundation of the Reformation. Hence their ancestors of the Remonstrant Synod and of the Non-Subscribing Presbytery of Antrim were in their time endeavouring to protect the very kernel of Protestantism and to maintain the principles of Luther's Reformation. The repression of individual thought in religious matters and the constant efforts to put down schism had made the great Churches of the world, Catholic and Protestant alike, splendid business organisations and instruments of great social and political power; but, on the other hand, under their influence, spiritual thought in the individual had been hampered, insincerity and indifference had been promoted, and the progressive development of religions suited to the age had been frustrated. A Catholic writer in a London paper, dealing with the question of "The Green Sphinx," recently stated that the two shadows which darkened Ireland were "the shadow of an army of occupation and the shadow of a dreadful priest power." If a Roman Catholic could write thus was it for them to stand idly by? "Ireland is dying," and against one of the causes of her decline they alone in Ireland possessed the antidote. To convert the creed-bound Catholic into an equally creed-bound Protestant, was but a slight advance, but to convert him into a thoughtful, responsible, religious, and moral Protestant, was a work well worth the doing. The country was now in a transition stage; slowly and imperceptibly a great revolution was going on around them. The elimination of the landlord class was throwing more responsibility upon the rank and file, and the average man must be better trained to play his part as a good Christian and a good citizen than he had ever been before. There was but little hope for him in the larger religious communities, which were all organised on the same plan of insistence on a rigid uniformity of religious belief. The great Churches, whether they be Roman Catholic or Protestant, usurped the right of the individual to think, and demanded that he should say "I believe," or remain outside the pale. No great advance could be expected from them so long as they remained hide-bound in routine. The small religious communities had ever been the centres of strongest spiritual influence, and in them the greatest hope for the future still lay. Their path was clear. The time was ripe for more vigorous effort in Ireland. Their duty was not to inculcate narrow religious dogma so much as to foster the "spirit of the Reformation"—to uphold the great first position of Martin Luther, to maintain the fundamental principle of Protestantism. Referring to the position of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church in Ireland, Dr. Campbell said anyone impartially studying its history must have been struck by the remarkable state of stagnation in which the denomination had lain for the past thirty or forty years. There were three directions in which they needed a revival—namely, in their organisation, their ministers, and their people. Without good organisation there could be no permanence, and they must adopt some form of Church government. Some system they must have, otherwise they had no real Church—they were merely a fortuitous assemblage of more or less cranky individuals, loosely held together by some similarity of religious views. Being a portion of the Irish Presbyterian Church, they naturally inclined towards that form of Church government, one advantage of which was that it enabled them to hold and dispense for the good of the congregations and for the advance of their religious opinions a sum of money vested in trustees, and called the Sustentation Fund, or by what other name they liked. A good Sustentation Fund would invigorate many of their isolated struggling congregations. Again, the Presbyterian form of government gave the minister adequate security of tenure, and enabled them to get men of superior abilities. The minister must preach to the lowest intellect in his congregation rather than to the highest, and for ages to come the appeal to the feelings—to love, pity, and fear—must be a more powerful instrument than the appeal to the intellect. As for the laity, for some reason, which it was difficult to explain, they had for many years been culpably negligent in the work of the Church, and they had in the main held aloof and left the business in the hands of the ministers. This was most unfortunate, for it removed that stimulus which the ministers required to keep them from becoming mere creatures of routine, while it had been adverse to the growth of the Church's financial resources. When they looked around the great charitable institutions in Belfast, they were amazed to see how many of them had been built, endowed, and supported by the money of Non-Subscribing Presbyterians. Their wealthy men had lavished their means upon charities, excellent in their way, but chiefly destined to help the poor of other denominations, and had left their own Church literally in starvation. Queen's College had benefited largely, both in past and present times, from the money of their Church members, and yet its president was chosen on the ground that he belonged to a particular Church, and its honours and emoluments fell to members of the large religious organisations. That institutions of this kind should flourish on the bounty of their people while the Church pined away for lack of money, was not as it ought to be, and must have come to pass through the laity not interesting themselves in their Church work, and understanding the relationship they bore to sectarian denominations. A second point on which the laity were open to severe criticism was their comparative neglect of religious observances, and of a proper training of their children in spiritual matters.

Want of enthusiasm was simply a sign that their people were being badly handled by their leaders, both lay and clerical. Then, more interest should be taken in the young members of their denomination by the prominent members of the Church. The Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church was the only Church in Ireland which was of no service to a young man who had to push his fortune. They need not resort to the methods of the proselytiser to maintain their Church membership, but they should at least try to promote the material interests of their struggling young men so far as it was possible justly to do so. The time must come when they must decide whether their Church, with its glorious traditions, was to be allowed to smoulder out of existence, or whether they were to unite in a determined and prolonged endeavour to place it in a proper position, and to extend its power and influence. There were within its boundaries the people and the money necessary to start a successful movement of advance, but they needed an energetic leader, united effort, and persistent activity. They were as much needed to balance religious affairs to-day as their ancestors were seventy-five years ago, and they required to assume a more aggressive attitude than they had recently shown. They badly wanted some of the old fighting instincts of their forefathers, and the determination to make their opinions felt in the world around them. In twenty-five years more their Church would have seen her hundredth birthday as an independent organisation: Surely they could in that time double her strength and influence. If they could not they would have failed to keep the trust which their forefathers bequeathed to them. They were the heirs of men who in divers times and in difficult phases of religious thought, lived and worked and preached and fought and died for liberty of conscience. Let them, in God's name, prove themselves worthy of their heritage.

The discussion on Dr. Campbell's paper, begun on Tuesday evening by the Revs. W. Napier and T. Dunkerley and Mr. John Rogers, was continued on Wednesday morning; and at the business meeting in the afternoon was further considered in the address of Principal Gordon, the out-going President. A Committee was appointed, to consist of delegates from the Association's constituent bodies, to mature a plan for the better union of the Church in a single ecclesiastical organisation. The Rev. W. Napier was elected President of the Association for the ensuing year, and subsequently presided over the annual dinner at Ye Olde Castle Restaurant.

REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

THE seventy-sixth annual meeting of this Synod was held on Tuesday, June 20, in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast, when there was a fair attendance of ministers and elders.

The Rev. F. THOMAS, the outgoing Moderator, preached at the religious service, and the clerk, the Rev. W. E. Mellone, having called the roll, proceeded to deliver his address. He thanked the Synod for the honour they had done him, and spoke of the past year as having been peaceful and prosperous for their churches. One notable thing had been the number of new organs acquired. They noted with gladness, he said, that the light of truth was breaking through the darkness of ancient creeds in almost all the great popular Churches. Only recently one famous creed was "cast as rubbish to the void," and it would be well with the Christian religion—with which it was not too well—and well for their Lord's great doctrine of the pure worship of the Father if other creeds might but follow that excellent example. Their enlightened forefathers did not labour in vain. The very strenuousness with which in certain quarters men were defending systems which the age was outgrowing was a sign to those who had eyes to see. Creeds and confessions of faith, a great writer had told them, were travesties of the teaching of Christ. "Freed at its birth from all dogmatic restraint," he said, "having struggled for three hundred years for liberty of conscience, Christianity, in spite of its failures, still reaps the results of its glorious origin. To renew itself it has but to return to the Gospel." The principles for which their fathers fought were vital to-day, and their churches everywhere were encouraged to "fight the good fight of faith," for it was certain if they were faithful the spirit of Christ, the spirit of love and peace, must gain the victory, and "God be all in all." When the Churches fully recognised the claims of that free spirit of inquiry to which Luther and Melancthon appealed, when they ceased to found their theology on isolated periods of history, when they were not afraid to say that Christ had revealed the Fatherhood of God to men and given them the faith that could solace their sorrows and support their hopes, then they were equally free to welcome all truths as coming from the "Father of light," and to regard every development of the intellect and of the Christian spirit as part of the Divine purpose with which Christ was sent to be "the light of the world." The churches of that Synod existed to help on that desirable consummation. They went back to Jesus himself; they believed in the great truth he taught that God is the Father of men; they believed in the immortal power of that truth and of Christ's spirit, and they believed no less in the claims of reason and conscience. They recognised one Divine purpose carried out in the life and teaching of Christ, and in the growth of the human intellect and of the truth which it acquired. With the British chieftain in Tacitus they were proud to say, "Bondage we have never borne." They welcomed all devout inquirers, all who sympathised with their aims, who were willing to work with them for God in the spirit of Christ. They invited their co-operation with them in the work of their churches.

> Blest is he that shall be exercised in these things;
> And he that layeth them up in his heart shall become wise.
> For if he do them he shall be strong to all things—
> For the light of the Lord is his guide.

While they cordially recognised the Christian character of the churches around them, they believed that the work which God had given them to do was increasingly demanded by the wants of the time. They were glad therefore to receive the support of all who sympathised with the aims and principles of their church, which were both Christian and free.

The Rev. J. J. Magill was unanimously elected the new Moderator, the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin as clerk, and the Rev. J. H. Bibby, assistant clerk.

Rev. J. A. Kelly, convener, submitted the report of the Financce Committee. The ten congregations on the Sustentation Fund had each received £60 for the year. The dividend due in July next might not be at the same rate, but the Committee asked the Synod to recommend the trustees to pay as much as the income would allow. The Committee had approved of Mr. Smyth's action in getting the authorities to consent to pay to him the whole of the income-tax deducted from the Synod's dividends before reaching him. This new departure began on April 6, so that from that date forward no certificates would be issued by Mr. Smyth to the ministers who benefited from the funds in question.

Mr. John Smyth, M.A., submitted the treasurer's report, which was encouraging, showing the amount in bank to be £214 17s. 9d. Mr. Smyth agreed to continue to act as treasurer of the Sustentation Fund, with Rev. T. Dunkerley as assistant for the ensuing year.

The reports were adopted, and a vote of sympathy with the Rev. A. B. Hamilton in his illness was passed.

Resolutions were passed urging on congregations the importance of the appointment of elders, and in the matter of temperance strongly advocating total abstinence.

THE June number of the British Friend, in an article on "The Power of Silence," referred to the longing that members of the Society of Friends had felt at the recent yearly meeting at Leeds for a fuller experience of the power of God, and the writer said:—

"There was a general feeling, at the "close of the meeting, of deep thankful- "ness that this desire had been granted; "but perhaps in ways rather different "from what some expected. There was "clearly a wish, on the part of a few, to "see the gatherings carried away by the "same kind of enthusiasm that has marked "the Welsh Revival. In some of the "devotional meetings prayers and ad- "dresses, sometimes of a rather excitable "character, followed in quick succession; "and not infrequently the singing of hymns "was started, occasionally before a speaker "had concluded. On the whole, however, "it was not these gatherings that left the "deepest impression behind them; to "some of us they were at times distinctly "painful. Many, it is believed, will join "with the writer in saying that, when "the Divine presence was most strongly "felt, it was accompanied not by fervent "prayers or song or words of any kind, "but by the touch of a heavenly stillness "that made words unnecessary. There "were times, and we wished they had "been more frequent, when this living "silence rose above all utterance, and "brought healing to our hearts as we were "drawn close together in the fellowship "of our living Lord."

The use of silence may become indeed an empty form, just as any other mode of worship, and yet there is much truth in what this writer says:—

"The world is very weary; it is bank- "rupt of moral energy; it needs rest that "it may gather strength. It is full of "striving and confusion; it needs the "peace and the order of lives that are "lived in the stillness of God."

Friends will render a great service if they can prove to the world the power of silence in common worship, and, as the writer says, "The strength that comes "from that inward stillness before God in "which the deep in one heart calls to "the deep in another; in which is known "that soul-reaching, soul-tendering power "and presence for which words may indeed "prepare the way, but which they can "never give."

EPILOGUE TO "HEBREW THEISM."

By F. W. NEWMAN.

We praise Thee in Thy power, O God!
We praise Thee in Thy sanctity.
We praise Thee who reignest in the furthest heavens,
We praise Thee who dwellest in our inmost souls,
Our Lord and hidden Comforter.
No voice can duly proclaim Thy greatness,
No heart can comprehend Thy goodness,
Oh Thou, Father of all our spirits.
The longings of the spirit are inexhaustible:
Only Thou canst fill the heart.
When it is empty and aching for Thee,
Hungering and thirsting for Thy righteousness,
Thou visitest it with peace unspeakable.
With Thee there is no misery to the distressed;
But sorrow is hallowed and pain is sweetened,
And hardship is assuaged and fear calmed.
For Thine own nature is blessedness,
And Thou makest Thy worshippers blessed.
Yea, blessed is Thy presence, O Lord most Holy!
Blessed is it to dwell with Thee and to know Thee,
To rest on Thee and to serve Thee.
Blessed shall the nations be, when Thy glory is recognised;
When all who love Thee unite to succour and raise the weak,
When men of all climes and colours know their union.
Meanwhile enable us to discern and love Thy servants,
Under whatever strange name or false creed they are hidden.
Strengthen us in life or death, in this and in every life,
To be Thine in fact, as we are Thine in right;
To obey cheerfully, to strive loyally,
To suffer meekly, to enjoy thankfully.
So shall we love Thee while we live, and partake of Thy joy,
And triumph over sorrow and fulfil Thy work,
And be numbered with Thy saints, and die on Thy bosom.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: George's-row Mission. — The Rev. F. Summers writing from the Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C., appeals to friends for funds with which to provide a day in the country for the children of the Sunday-school, towards which the scholars themselves contribute a share. Through the death of certain kind subscribers Mr. Summers is compelled to make this appeal.

Capel-y-fadfa, S. Wales.—On Wednesday, June 21, there was a large gathering, including many friends of other churches, at the laying of the memorial stone of the new chapel. The Rev. W. James, J.P., of Llandyssil, a former minister of the congregation, presided, and after the singing of a hymn followed by readings of Scripture, and a prayer by the Rev. J. Davies, of Ailtyplaca, Captain Wm. Davies, Rhydowenfach, a faithful member of the church, performed the ceremony of laying the stone, and delivered a stirring address. Next came the chairman's address, in which he congratulated the congregation on its past history, its faithfulness, its responsiveness, and its prospects of a bright future. The other speakers were:—Revs. J. Davies, T. A. Thomas, L. Williams, E. O. Jenkins (minister), T. C. Benjamin (Congregationalist), J. Davies (Anglican), Mr. J. R. Thomas, and Mr. T. G. Thomas. For two hours, beginning at 2.30 in the afternoon, the open air meeting was enjoyed. It is earnestly hoped that the £600 still required will soon be found, so that the congregation (which dates back to 1812, and their old chapel to 1813) may open their new chapel free of debt.

Chorley.—A young people's Guild recently formed has proven very helpful to the church life, both the ordinary meetings and rambles being well attended. The Rev. G. Pegler, an old friend of the congregation, occupied the pulpit on Sunday evening last.

Exeter.—The 250th annual assembly of West of England Presbyterian Divines met at George's Meeting on Wednesday, June 21. The proceedings were private. The Rev. J. H. Hicks, Congregational minister, Uffculme, was elected moderator, and the Rev. John Barron, of the Abbey Chapel, Tavistock, was re-elected scribe. The assembly dinner was at the Royal Clarence Hotel. Previous to the assembly, the annual Conference of Devon Ministers was held, and in the afternoon the congregation met the ministers at tea, when several addresses were given.

Great Yarmouth.—The Social Union had a successful excursion on Thursday week to Fritton Lake. The Sale of Work recently held and opened by Mr. Councillor A. M. Stevens, of Norwich, was a great success, and exceeded the most sanguine expectations.

London: Forest Gate.—The Rev. H. W. Perris last Sunday evening delivered a highly interesting address on Mazzini. The preacher emphasised the enthusiasm of humanity which early characterised the Italian patriot, and his high sense of ideality which often alienated him from possible adherents. Emphasis was laid on what the preacher called the Mazzinian philosophy, and the lecture throughout was illustrated by reference to characteristic incidents in the life of the patriot.

London: Essex Church.—The Hospital Sunday Collection amounted to £193. The new memorial font, presented by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, will be unveiled at the morning service on Sunday next.

Maidstone.—The Rev. S. S. Brettell preached his farewell sermons at Earl-street Chapel on Sunday, June 25. After the evening service a presentation was made of the "Life of Dr. Martineau" and the "Autobiography of Herbert Spencer." Mr. A. J. Ellis, in making the presentation on behalf of the congregation, said that Mr. Brettell had by his character, and his great interest in all institutions connected with Earl-street Chapel, done most excellent work, not only in their own circle but in the town generally. He wished Mr. Brettell all happiness in the future. Mr. M. A. Ruck (the hon. secretary) testified to the good influence of Mr. Brettell's high character, the lofty ideals presented in his preaching, and the practical value of his teaching. Mr. Brettell, in reply, expressed his thanks for the kindness he had received during his residence at Maidstone, and for the hearty support he had had in his work. The Sunday-school and the choir also made presentations, and expressed their great regret at losing such a wise and helpful friend as Mr. Brettell.

Park Lane, near Wigan (Farewell).—The Rev. J. E. Stead preached his farewell sermon on Sunday afternoon last, his text being "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." The chapel was filled to its utmost capacity. Amongst those present were a number of friends from other congregations, with whom Mr. Stead has always been on friendly terms. At the conclusion of the service the congregation adjourned to the school-room, where a farewell gathering was held. Mr. R. Unsworth, who presided, referred to the coming of Mr. and Mrs. Stead amongst them over fourteen years ago, and spoke in high terms of the faithful services they had both rendered in congregation and school. He presented to Mr. and Mrs. Stead the various articles which had been freely given by members of the congregation, including a gold mounted umbrella from Mr. Stead's adult class, and a purse of gold from the congregation; and to Mrs. Stead a gold brooch, set with rubies and pearls, from the adult females, and a beautifully chased silver teapot. Mr. Stead suitably responded for himself and Mrs. Stead, and the gathering was brought to a close with the benediction.

Sheffield District S.S. Union.—The quarterly meeting was held at Stannington on June 24. Fifty were present to tea, after which the Rev. A. H. Dolphin gave a short address on the history of Stannington Chapel. A very interesting conversation ensued amongst the teachers. The secretary was asked to forward the following resolution to the Rev. Iden Payne:—"This meeting of the Sheffield and District Unitarian Sunday School Union desire to unite with the Stannington congregation in expressing their appreciation of the long and faithful services of the Rev. Iden Payne during his ministry at Stannington, and in thanking him for his kindly sympathy with and help to this Union, hope that he may still enjoy many years of quiet happiness and well-earned repose."

Shrewsbury.—The 115th anniversary of the High-street Church Sunday-school was celebrated on Sunday, June 18, when the services were conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street. There was a large attendance, special music by the choir, and the church was prettily decorated.

Stannington.—On Whit Monday the children of the Sunday-school met at the parsonage about 2 o'clock, and after parading the village and the singing of hymns at friends' houses, had tea in the school-room with a large gathering of teachers and friends, after which the evening was pleasantly spent in a field kindly lent by Mr. G. H. Revitt. The anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 18, the preacher being the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield. The congregations were large, the chapel in the evening being crowded to excess. Special hymns were sung by the scholars and choir, and the collections were quite satisfactory.

OUR CALENDAR.

Words and Music . (net) 3s. 6d.
Words Edition only . (net) 1s. 6d.

NOVELLO & CO., 1, Berners St., London, W.

This book has been prepared for churches of the Liberal Faith, and chiefly with a view to supplying a long-felt want—a book in which the appropriate tune is on the same page with the hymn. The words have been carefully selected to provide expression, not for one school of thought only among Liberal churches, but for the whole range of religious life and experience. The musical Edition contains most of the well-known and popular tunes by Dykes, Sullivan, Barnby, Stainer, &c., associated with familiar hymns, and new tunes by well-known musicians for newer hymns. The harmonies have been revised by Mr. Granville Bantock.

Special terms are offered to churches taking quantities. Application must be made in all such cases to the Secretary, 3, John Street, Hampstead, London, N.W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE published last year, in THE INQUIRER of Nov. 5, a letter from Miss Octavia Hill appealing on behalf of the National Trust for help towards the purchase of Gowbarrow Park on Ullswater. This week Miss Hill enforces her appeal in another letter, reporting the progress of the effort, of which we are very glad to hear. Public meetings have been held in Manchester, Leeds, and Newcastle, and committees have been formed to take up the work of rousing public interest and collecting funds, and it is hoped that similar steps will be taken in Liverpool and Birmingham. The Manchester meeting was held on June 23 in the Town Hall, when addresses were given by Miss Octavia Hill, Canon Rawnsley, Vice-Chancellor Hopkinson, and others, making a powerful plea, which was strongly supported by the Manchester Guardian that same morning.

A LETTER on this subject from Miss Octavia Hill appeared in the Spectator of June 10, the latter part of which was as follow :—"It appears to me that this scheme should commend itself specially to the great manufacturing towns of the north. The Lake District concerns them more than any of us. It is the natural outlet for the holiday time of poor and rich from their crowded districts. Such an area as this, which they now have an opportunity of preserving, will be a joy, a rest, and a refreshment to the North Country in perpetuity. If the inhabitants of six of the great towns would amongst them contribute £1,000, not a large sum for so priceless a boon, the thing would be more than done. I will not say a word more about the breezy slopes, upland moor, lake shore, ravines, and waterfalls, or of their beauty in every season. I have written of them before, and surely they must be present to the imaginations of many who care deeply for them, and who have not yet contributed even their mite towards this fund for their preservation. To all such I would appeal to send their gifts at once, lest it be too late. They will be gratefully received by Canon Rawnsley at Crosthwaite Vicarage, Keswick, by the secretary of the National Trust, or by me.—I am, Sir, &c., OCTAVIA HILL."

190, Marylebone-road, N.W.

To which the editor of the Spectator appended the following note :—"It will be a thousand pities if, after all, Gowbarrow cannot be made an open space for ever. To us one of the most attractive things about the scheme to buy Gowbarrow is the fact that the money subscribed cannot possibly do harm as well as good, as is the case with so many public benefactions. No one can be pauperised, or deprived of self-reliance, or kept idle by making the public free of the noble stretch of 'woods, waters, wastes,' sought to be purchased by the National Trust."

ANOTHER appeal we publish this week will be found in the article on the Bedford College for Women, which is faced by a grave crisis in its history. A demand for £150,000 may well stagger even the most enthusiastic friends of education, if it is to be compassed without the aid of the national Exchequer ; unless, indeed, some devoted friend of women's education should be inspired, as both women and men have been inspired in America, to make a great endowment. But the appeal is one to which we could not refuse a hearing, and the matter is fairly open for serious discussion.

A FULLER programme of the Geneva meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in August has now been issued, with a list of the hotels recommended by the local committee and other particulars. Our readers will remember the advantages of cheap tickets offered, if parties of thirty arrange to start from London on the three Fridays preceding the meetings on August 28—31. Friends who intend to start on Friday, August 11, and so have a fortnight's holiday in Switzerland before the days in Geneva, should send in their applications at once to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie at Essex Hall.

THE regular sessions of the Council are to be held in the hall of the University ; the three sermons on successive days, in French, German, and English, will be preached in the Cathedral of St. Pierre. The programme is as follows :—

MONDAY, AUG. 28.
8 p.m. Sermon in French by the Rev. E. Roberty, of Paris.
9.30 p.m. Reception of visitors in the rooms of the Société Littéraire.

TUESDAY, AUG. 29.
9—12 a.m. Address of Professor Chantre (Président d'honneur).
Address of Professor Montet (Président).
Report of the General Secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendte.
Reports on Liberal Religion in various countries.
2—4 p.m. Further reports.
5—9 p.m. Steamer trip on the lake.

WEDNESDAY, AUG. 30.
9 a.m. Sermon in German, by Professor Furrer, of Zürich.
10.30—12.30. Papers, "d'ordre religieux théorique."
2—5 p.m. Ditto
8.30 p.m. Conversazione at the Palais Eynard.

THURSDAY, AUG. 31.
9 A.M. Sermon in English, by the Rev. M. J. Savage, of New York.
10.30—12.30. Papers, "d'ordre religieux pratique."
2—4 p.m. Ditto.
5 p.m. Closing of the Council.
6 p.m. Organ recital in the Cathedral.
8 p.m. Banquet.

On Sunday, Sept. 3, the Rev. Charles Wagner, of Paris, will preach in the Cathedral.

Among the reports from various countries announced are the following : The Rev. A. Altherr, of Basle, on "Religious Liberalism in German Switzerland," the Rev. A. Bourrier on "The Work of Reform in France," Professor Eerdmans on "Liberal Theology and Religion in Holland," and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie on "The Number, Organisation, and Conditions of Unitarian Churches in Great Britain and Ireland." Among the papers classed as theoretical are, Professor Carpenter's on "The recent Progress of New Testament Study in Great Britain," and M. Hyacinthe Loyson's "Des religions monothéistes et de leur rapports." On the "practical" side, Professor Jean Réville is to contribute a paper on "The Question of the Separation of the Churches and the State in France," and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on "The Relations of Liberal Christianity towards Social Reform." Papers are also announced, but not yet their subjects, by Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin; Professor Francis G. Peabody, of Harvard; and Professor George Boros, of Koloszvár, and others.

We are glad to hear that Mr. Benoyendra Nath Sen, of Calcutta, whose letter telling of the death of Mr. Mozoomdar, we recently published, is on his way to Europe to attend the International meetings at Geneva, where he will represent the Brahmo Samaj, and read a paper.

The death of Mr. John Hay, Secretary of State, is a serious loss to this country, and to all friends of peace and international amity, no less than to America. No one has done nobler service in those high interests than he, both while resident as American Ambassador in London and in his later office at Washington.

The Bill for the Separation of Church and State in France was passed by the Chamber of Deputies on Monday last by a majority of 233. There seems little doubt that the Bill will be accepted by the Senate and become law. A time of difficult trial is therefore before our brethren of the French Protestant Churches, in which we shall follow their fortunes with warm sympathy and interest.

Dr. Talbot, hitherto Bishop of Rochester, was last week enthroned as Bishop of Southwark, and on Monday St. Saviour's Church was inaugurated as the Cathedral of the new diocese, the service being attended by the King and Queen. Dr. F. H. Chase, President of Queen's College, Cambridge, is appointed Bishop of Ely, in succession to Lord Alwyne Compton, who has resigned.

Among the King's Birthday honours, announced last week, were six new appointments to the Order of Merit, to which the first appointments (including the late G. F. Watts and W. H. Lecky) were made in June, 1902. The new list includes the names of Sir Alma Tadema, Mr. Holman Hunt, and Mr. George Meredith.

Mr. Holman Hunt was last week the recipient, also, of an honorary degree at Oxford, where, at the Encænia, a similar honour was conferred on M. Paul Sabatier; Professor G. H. Darwin, of Cambridge, the son of Charles Darwin; and Mr. C. S. Loch, of the Charity Organisation Society.

To Correspondents. — Letters, &c., received from C. C. A., W. E. A., C. A. G., J. C. H., W. C. H., L. A. J., E. L. M., R. J. O., P. P., J. R., P. E. R., R. R., A. S., E. H. S., W. C. W.

"HOLDING THE FORT."

It has been my good fortune to be spending over a month in a small town in the south of the Green Island, a town with an ancient history and once of some importance, but now, alas! dwindling away, as so great a portion of Ireland is doing, from the depletion of constant emigration and of chronic poverty. Once-noble houses stand roofless, floorless, and wrecked; wayside cottages in numbers are types of desolation; labourers for the farms are hard to get, and the flower of them seek foreign shores. Eheu!

I am not entirely on holiday. I have been ministering for five Sundays in the old Presbyterian chapel here, a chapel which once boasted a fair congregation, and had behind it a history reaching to Cromwellian times. But here, too, the same fate which has denuded the town has been at work. Some families have died out, others have moved away, until the entire congregation numbers four, all children of the last minister. But instead of giving way to gloom and despair, instead of deserting the old cause, these four worship with marvellous regularity in the old Zion. When a minister can be found they gladly avail themselves of his spiritual help; but if not, still they worship, and one leads and reads a printed sermon. Seldom is the chapel closed on a Sunday morning. What an example of loyalty and true piety is here! Would to God that our easy-going members all over the kingdom—yes, and in far countries too—whom the least excuse, heat or cold, wet or drought, trifling aches or social pleasures will keep from worship, could be inoculated with a like loyalty and zeal. Our chapels would soon be too few and too small for the swelling hosts of adherents!

On my first Sunday the whole congregation was present. There was no instrument, and the hymns were sung mainly by one lady. There is an old high pulpit which I eschewed, and a reading desk below which I used. During the week the lady in question left home on a visit to a sick friend, and for four weeks my hearers have been but three. I managed to borrow a harmonium, not over-good, which I have played, leading the singing with such voice as I can muster. Yet I honestly testify that I have got more spiritual help, and have had higher enjoyment through ministering to this little flock than I have often experienced with large congregations, beautiful edifices, and fine music to aid my efforts. The faithful few "holding the fort" in the old sanctuary inspire one with a new sense of the reality of religion and the value of worship. Long may they live to worship in spirit and in truth! But—after them—the deluge! The chapel and endowments will be disposed of as the Charity Commissioners see fit, and the old town will hear no more of Unitarian Christianity. It is already almost wholly Roman Catholic. There is a fine Episcopal church, an orthodox Presbyterian and a Methodist chapel, and a tiny muster of Friends; but no prospect of these developing to larger proportions.

If there were any chance of growth, and an income, however scant, on which a man could live, what a happy place to end one's days in this would be. A lovely valley with a fine river rolling through it; rising ground on either side, hardly bold enough to be called mountains, but tempting to climb into higher air and wider views; beautiful walks in all directions; a quaint and interesting town, and a civil if somewhat uncouth population.

Neither is there the dirt and squalor one has been led to associate with the idea of Southern Ireland. True, customs are primitive, and bare-legged, bare-headed children swarm on the pathways. Yet I have seen worse things in the slums of Liverpool than I see here. But, alas! in one point even Liverpool is outdone. In the main streets it seems as if every third shop is a drink-shop, while the disastrous grocer's license flourishes balefully, and the grocery half of the business is evidently only the excuse for the drink half. The impoverishment is easily accounted for!

Once a month a fair is held, when the centre of the town is crowded with animals of various kinds. Cows by the hundred, bulls by the score, in the principal street; cart-loads of pigs young and old in a side road; horses and ponies, asses and sheep, in crowds; while the noise, the filth, the odours, the pushing and pulling, whacking and shouting make a pandemonium. It is the drink-sellers' interest to retain this nuisance at their doors, or otherwise it would be removed to open fields. Talking of asses, I never saw a place so populous with the four-legged variety; not even in Egypt. And the loads they tug along! Poor little creatures!

But after all, the interest for us lies in that empty chapel, with its big square pews capable of seating a congregation of over one hundred and fifty; with its woodwork worm-eaten and crumbling with dry-rot; its haunting sense of bygone pieties and the reverent worthies who once made it alive with their praises and prayers. No blame attaches to its decay; it only shares the lot of the country in which it stands. But how about the many Zions on this side of the channel, where sloth and indifference keep the pews scantily filled; where niggardliness allows of dirt and decay which would not be dreamt of in the homes of the people to whom it is "Bethel," the House of their God! Yet, alas! there are such up and down the land. Oh, for a Revival! Oh, for a new value on worship, a new longing for the courts of the Lord, a new sense of the supreme importance of religion; of open, avowed, organised recognition of Spiritual needs and their satisfaction.

I look forward in the hope of visiting once more this outpost, and once more being strengthened by the fidelity of its tiny garrison, holding the fort to the end.

LITERATURE.

A THEIST'S APOLOGY.*

THE Rev. Walter Lloyd, whose practised pen has rendered good service for many years to the cause of rational religion, has published under the above title a very clear, concise, and forcible defence of theism against current criticisms of "agnosticism." Such a volume cannot fail to be extremely useful to those who have been influenced by the publications issued by the Rationalist Press. Undoubtedly much of this literature is of an instructive and stimulating kind, and, as is clear from his pages, Mr. Lloyd would be the last to deprecate its issue or its perusal. But he realises, as most sensible men must, how much easier it is to break down than to build up; and his "Apology" is offered in a friendly way to those who have felt their religious trust threatened, and who have not as yet found their way down to the bed-rock that cannot be shaken.

Mr. Lloyd specially utilises the statements to be found in such writers as Spencer and Huxley, in order to show that, whatever difficulties and paradoxes may be found in a theistic interpretation of the universe, equal or greater exist in connection with the "agnostic" position. His contention, indeed, is that the difficulties in the latter case are much greater. If "evil" is a troublesome problem to the theist, "good" is certainly no less a problem to the agnostic. The following passage emphasises a real point against Huxley, and it may be taken as fairly illustrating the author's style:—

"The Agnostic blames the Theist for "overlooking inconsistencies, for accepting "paradoxes, but can the Agnostic escape? "The Agnostic believes in the Cosmic "process. What has Professor Huxley to "say?

"'Social progress means a checking of "the cosmic process at every step and the "substitution for it of another, which may "be called the ethical process.' 'The "practice of that which is ethically best— "what we call goodness or virtue—in- "volves a course of conduct which, in all "respects, is opposed to that which leads "to success in the cosmic struggle for "existence.' 'Let us understand, once for "all, that the ethical progress of society "depends, not on imitating the cosmic "process, still less in running away from "it, but in combating it.'

"The Agnostic himself requires us to "believe in a paradox. Everything has "proceeded from the cosmic process, but "there is also an ethical process which "combats the cosmic process. Yet the one "springs from the other, and the cosmos, "like man, is divided against itself. It is "the spirit striving against flesh, or against "the material world on a larger scale.

"The cosmic process has evolved "another process which is on a higher "level than itself, and which is opposed to "it, or else the cosmic energy has given "birth to two processes, one of which is "higher than another. I do not dispute "the fact upon which the proposition is "based; the struggle is a real one, it is at "the bottom of the highest religion, but "the Theist calls the ethical process a "divine process; he regards it as the "incoming of a higher power. The "Agnostic evolves it out of that which "does not contain it; unless, as Clifford "called the substance out of which the "world is formed, 'mind-stuff' because it "had given birth to mind, the Agnostic is "willing to call it 'ethic-stuff' as it has "given birth to the ethical process."

It appears to us that Mr. Lloyd does not press this point a whit too far. Indeed, his book is marked by a moderation and candour unhappily too often lacking in controversy. He admits all that the agnostic can reasonably claim as to the need for modesty in dealing with the questions of God and human destiny; he goes to some trouble to show that consciousness of this need is characteristic of the deeper religious literature of all the ages; but, having gone thus far with his opponent, he claims attention to his own argument which, put briefly, is: "evil" in nature is less evil than it looks, and can by no means be set down to malevolence; on the contrary, "beneficence" characterises our world, as the maintenance and advance of man prove; our "feelings" have a right to be heard as witnesses, and many besides Wordsworth "have felt a Presence" so exalted and exalting alike through nature and conscience, that only the attributes of deity express their sense of its greatness; and, though there is much cause for reticence, there is also good ground for confident declaration of a lively trust in God, our maker, our inspirer, our lawgiver, and our friend. The volume thus summarised is, it is true, itself but a summary of a great argument. To some the need of greater fulness, of wider range of illustration, may seem a pressing one; yet even these will be served by bringing to a focus the principal lines of positive thought as Mr. Lloyd has done here. There will be many others to whom, in this busy age, the brevity of the book will be an added advantage. It aims at meeting a popular need, but it is none the less careful in treatment on that account and we heartily commend it to all thoughtful inquirers for religious truth.

LIFE OF DR. MOMERIE.*

AMONGST the men who, towards the end of last century, aimed at enlargement of the popular mind in matters religious, Dr. Momerie was one of the most prominent. In all his pulpit utterances there was a combination of lucidity and unconventionality which arrested the attention of even the most callous churchgoer. It was felt that this man had something to say on serious questions which merited attention, and to many his teaching opened out conceptions of God and Christ hitherto entirely unconsidered.

This record of Dr. Momerie's brief, though not uneventful, career is interesting in many ways; it reveals the struggle of a highly gifted man, amid obstacles not a few, to reach below dogmas and hearsays to reality, and it further reveals how earnestly he sought by voice and pen to help the men and women of his day towards a faith impervious to those materialistic attacks which he had himself so bravely faced. Very touching is the account which is given us of the lonely lad brought up amid the influences of a Calvinistic home. How, later on, the youth broke with the traditions of his Nonconformist parents—how he passed with much brilliance through his university life at Edinburgh and Cambridge, all this is told with some fulness, though at the same time with a wise restraint.

Dr. Momerie's emergence as a recognised Broad Church preacher came at a very early stage of his clerical experiences, but he was not long allowed to pass unchallenged by the advocates of ecclesiastical orthodoxy. In 1880 he had been appointed to the Chair of Logic and Metaphysics in King's College, London, and at the beginning of 1889 the authorities of the College took exception to the teaching offered in his then just-published volume on "Inspiration." The account of this lamentable "King's College affair" (lamentable as yet another illustration of theological intolerance and pettiness) is given very largely in Dr. Momerie's own words, and the justification of his attitude is, we think, fully made out.

In the years following the expulsion from King's and his retirement from the Foundling, Dr. Momerie travelled largely in America and Australia. Very deep appears to have been the impression made upon him by the Chicago "Parliament of Religions," in which he himself had part. After his return to England in 1896, efforts were made to secure a church of his own, but how (through a piece of bigotry) he failed to obtain this, and how eventually he was "compelled to minister in the Portman Rooms," is recorded for us in this excellently constructed biography.

The rapidity of that last illness, at the end of 1900, was tragic in the extreme; the indefatigable spirit of the man was shown to the very end, and, though death came at the comparatively early age of 51, he had lived to earn recognition as a powerful thinker, and to be assured that his influence as a religious teacher was bearing fruit. Altogether (whatever his faults of performance or of judgment) an earnest, large-hearted man, one who indeed "strove for highest ends."

We have refrained from discussing the question, inevitably suggested by this volume, as to the "ethics of subscription." Certainly Dr. Momerie's view of "The Incarnation," as expounded in his earlier writings (vide "Defects of Modern Christianity"), was to a large extent consistent with "orthodoxy"; whether, however, the tendencies and even the explicit teaching of his later books could be defended on the same lines is open to doubt. While some of us may sympathise with his intense desire to widen out the historic National Church, we may question whether, in his own case, the good work of liberalising men's conceptions of religion could not have been as well or even better carried out by the breaking of external bonds; he was ostracised by nearly all the clergy, and his later ministrations were pre-eminently of benefit to those outside the pale of orthodox churchmanship. But this is too large a question for discussion at the end of an article, and it must be admitted that Dr. Momerie himself ably expressed the reasons which seemed to him sufficient in support of his claim to be "a son of the Church."

* "Dr. Momerie: His Life and Work." Written and Edited by His Wife. (Blackwood. 12s. 6d.)

There are many passages throughout the volume which we should like to quote; for two only can we find room, however, and with them we will conclude this brief survey.

"I have been asked to join the Unitar-
"ians. I am a Unitarian as much or as "little as Dean Stanley was. I would
"as soon think of joining the Unitarians
"as the Methodists or Baptists. Why "should I dub myself with a name which "narrows my free thought. . . . Stop-
"ford Brooke and Voysey agree with me
"in many things; but Voysey told "me I said too much for Christ, and "Stopford Brooke thinks less of the "Church than I do. I should be glad if
"the Church could be saved."

"I am reminded of a story told of "Dr. Ryle, Bishop of Liverpool. He "was a good old-fashioned Evangelical.
"He did not mind dissenters so long as "they were orthodox, but he could not "stand Unitarians. On one occasion he "was speaking at a meeting of ministers
"of all denominations, and he said, 'I
"see around me Methodists and Congre-
"gationalists' (at this moment his eye
"fell on Dr. Beard, the Unitarian) 'and—
"and—and—and what not!' I could "not help feeling that I was in the
"what not of this distinguished Congress."

ULLSWATER AND THE NATIONAL TRUST.

Sir,—You were good enough to insert, last November, a letter describing the scheme for securing for the public, in perpetuity, more than 700 acres of mountain land on the Lake of Ullswater. I received, in consequence, many donations from your readers, and I should like to express our hearty thanks.

Substantial progress has been made since then towards securing the purchase money; £7,200 out of the £12,000 required has been obtained. But it is most important now to get the balance, which is still very large, and I shall be very grateful if you will make this known to your readers. A lady has offered £50 conditional on 19 others contributing a like sum before the end of August. Four of these have been obtained, but we need 15 more if we are thus to add £1,000 to our fund. Small sums are also valued, and, to me, it is very delightful to realise how very much of the £7,200 which has come has been in gifts from the numerous professional men who, more and more, seek the Lakes for their annual holiday, and who realise how essential to the enjoyment of others also is the possession of an area open to all, for all time, and kept in its unspoiled loveliness and wild beauty.

If any such would send to me, or to Canon Rawnsley, Crossthwaite Vicarage, Keswick, gifts, large or small, they will be gratefully received, and duly acknowledged. That this great opportunity may not be lost, we are appealing to the manufacturing towns of the North; but it also behoves us all to consider what we ourselves can do to preserve so great a heritage for the landless many who, year by year, in increasing numbers, seek in the quiet and beauty of the country a well-earned holiday from the "manstifled" town.

STATE INTERFERENCE.

Sir,—I suppose that Mr. B. Kirkman Gray, together with most of your readers, would repudiate Government interference with the Freedom of Worship, of Trade, and of Private Life, but he seemed to take it for granted that it would be desirable if applied to manufacturing, although that would necessarily affect trade as well as the personal relations of the public. He believes that State workshops making boots for the "millions" who need them, at the expense of the tax-payers (who might, in consequence, have to go without themselves), are practicable, although the experiment was tried by Louis Blanc in 1848 with illuminating results. He believes that if a man is unemployed, that is necessarily the consequence of the system of modern industry, and not, in Leicester and elsewhere, often due to the man's caprice or his Union's unwisdom. He says that the country must not leave the workman destitute, and would add another national charity system to that of the existing Poor Law, accepting, apparently, the corollary to his proposition that a man's own wishes as to where and what at and on what terms he is to work are to be deferred to, finding employment and wages out of the taxes, forgetting that this practice, from 1790 to 1835, lowered wages, increased pauperism, diminished employment, and degraded the working classes. He believes in the "national organisation of industry," unaware that such organisation is not of a stereotyped pattern, as easy to reproduce as playing on the piano, but a living organism, constantly changing and developing, often in most unexpected directions.

I am moved to this protest by impatience with the tendency of latter-day teaching, in our chapels as in the churches, to ignore the old-time cult of character, replacing it by a cult of circumstance. We are no longer taught that men should be self-conscious, self-reliant, firm, but hear and read instead that they are mere creatures of environment, of "systems," and that only a miracle-working State or municipality can convert the plastic clay into useful citizens.

Richard Simon.

Nottingham, July 4, 1905.

On this subject the following letter has been issued by members of the Christian Social Union:—

Sir,—We, the undersigned members of the Christian Social Union, desire to express what seems to us to be the Christian view of the relation of the community to the unemployed.

In doing this we find that we are compelled to disassociate ourselves from those writers and speakers who, regarding a lack of employment, even under present circumstances, as a fault, would afford the unemployed no refuge but the workhouse, or be content with the indifference of the law of supply and demand, or with the charity of pity.

We find that we are also unable to associate ourselves with those who, regarding employment as a right, demand that work shall be provided irrespective of the character of the worker or of the needs of the community.

We believe that it is the duty of the community to regard the least of its members with the reverence due to the brother of our Lord Christ, and, at the common cost, to put within the reach of honest effort the possibility of a right human development.

We support the principle of the Bill for Unemployed Workmen because it sets up an authority in touch with each locality, which can offer work such as a man can accept without loss of self-respect, and not retain without self-denial; and also because, in establishing labour registries, the community places its own wide experience at the disposal of its weaker and poorer members.

We know that the Bill is capable of amendment. The extension of the compulsory powers to the provinces is vital to its success. We recognise also the risk that the new bodies will, when they are constituted, disappoint hopes by making "relief" too attractive or too deterrent.

But, in spite of difficulties and risks, we cannot but recognise in the Bill the right acknowledgment that the enforced idleness of any man who is genuinely able and willing to work is not merely an individual misfortune which can be left to the rash and irregular action of voluntary relief, but is a social disaster and a public peril, against which the Christian spirit constrains the community to seek and organise a permanent remedy.

THE ANSDELL MOVEMENT.

Sir,—With your permission I would draw your readers' attention to the progress that has been made towards the establishment of Unitarianism in the St. Anne's neighbourhood.

The movement originated with Mr. Grundy and a few friends early in the year, and the interest has been sustained throughout. Only evening service is held, but this is so well attended that the room—the largest obtainable in the district—is inconveniently small to accommodate a congregation averaging about sixty. It is thought that a more suitable building would be the means of drawing together the numerous families that in recent years have migrated from the towns, as well as others who flock to the coast in the holiday season. With improved railway facilities there has been a rapid growth along the coast line between Lytham and Fleetwood, a district which is now practically a suburb of Manchester.

The gain of this sea-swept area has been the loss of the inland towns, and nowhere is this more felt than in Sunday-school and church work, as many of our Unitarian Associations can testify. Families leave for these health resorts, and, finding no Unitarian institution to receive them, are drawn, often through friendship, to identify themselves with other causes, finally drifting away from Unitarianism altogether.

There are two Unitarian churches at Blackpool, serving the north and south portions of the town respectively, but between South Shore and Lytham, a distance of some six miles, there has not hitherto been any activity, although both Lytham and St. Anne's have large residential populations.

Ansdell, which is itself a growing centre, has been chosen as being midway between St. Anne's and Lytham, and there appears to be ample material from which to build a substantial congregation. Indeed, the prospects are such that the members of the Ansdell Mission are now considering the advisability of leasing a plot of land they have had offered on very favourable terms, and the erection of a small building to be used as a church and school, which, in the event of a larger church being needed, would serve as a school, the site being large enough for both.

No doubt summer visitors will appreciate this effort to provide suitable accommodation, and along with others who have the Unitarian cause at heart give substantial help to the movement.

Several ministers and laymen have given assistance, and there seems to be no want of good-will on the part of those who have been brought in contact, so that, if the efforts of the Ansdell friends are only seconded as they deserve to be, there seems to be no reason why a church that would be a credit to the Unitarian body should not be permanently established here.

The secretary is Mr. W. Milner, of Commonside, Ansdell, and Mr. R. Webb, Woodcote, St. Anne's, is treasurer.

BEDFORD COLLEGE FOR WOMEN.

AN APPEAL.

IT should be of consequence to the readers of the INQUIRER to realise the present anxious position in which Bedford College is placed. From small beginnings nearly fifty-six years ago, it has grown to be one of the "Schools" of the Teaching University of London, and is recognised by Parliament as a University College, receiving a Parliamentary grant as such, and it is the only college for women that is so recognised. Ever since the degrees at the University of London were thrown open to women, Bedford College has been foremost in preparing students for these degrees, and at present two-thirds of its students are reading with this end in view. That such a Women's University College is required in London is shown by the largely increasing number of students each year. There are now about 280 students, 40 of whom are in residence. Of late years there has been a large proportion of students from the Colonies, America, and foreign countries.

The College is well-known for the excellence of its teaching on both the literary and the scientific side and for the various kinds of training which it gives; first, to secondary teachers, with practice in many different kinds of schools; and second, to factory and sanitary inspectors in scientific hygiene, and to teachers of hygiene itself; and third, to art pupils who like to work in a studio kept exclusively for the use of women.

During last session there were ninety-five students preparing for degrees in Arts, a larger number than at any of the other London Colleges. Mr. S. H. Butcher, one of the foremost classical scholars, has pleaded for the support of Bedford College in the Academy on the ground that women have such a great influence in laying the early foundations of literary education in the children of the nation, and that at Bedford College "humanistic learning, both ancient and modern, holds a prominent place and is conducted on academic lines."

Facilities for the study of various Sciences are very great at Bedford College, as there are six different laboratories and excellent mathematical teaching to inculcate the necessary accuracy in observations and calculations. The instruction prepares for the Science Degrees at the University of London leaving the purely medical subjects to be treated at the Women's Medical College. Much good work in the way of exposure of nuisances and improvement in hygienic conditions has been done by the factory and sanitary inspectors trained at Bedford College.

The long list of distinguished men and women who devoted themselves to starting and maintaining this College should be very well-known amongst those of our household of Faith. Amongst those who have worked for the College may be mentioned Mrs. Reid and her sister Miss Sturch, Miss Bostock, Mrs. John Martineau and her daughter Jane Martineau, the devoted Hon. Secretary for many years; Mrs. and Miss Anna Swanwick, Miss A. J. Clough, Miss Emily Davies, Mr. and Mrs. Hensleigh Wedgwood, many of the Darwin family, Mr. William Shaen, Mr. R. H. Hutton, Rev. Philip Le Breton and his daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Enfield, Dr. Russell, Mr. and Mrs. S. Pett, Mrs. Susanni, and others. The students are too numerous to mention, as they have taken their places in almost every walk of life open to women, and in many Colonial and foreign countries as well as in Great Britain.

The College has always been entirely free from religious tests, and has been managed on the broadest principles, both educational and moral.

The influence and spheres of work for women have wonderfully increased of late years, and greater preparation is expected of them before they can take up any kind of work, so that larger opportunities than in the past must be given to them to secure proper qualification. College life, with its ethical and social advantages, is of the utmost importance in the formation of character and the strengthening of self-reliance. It is therefore of the utmost consequence that such an institution as Bedford College, where social and academic life are so well combined for women, should be adequately maintained.

The College is at present in leasehold premises, one portion of which will have to be surrendered in March, 1909; and as Lord Portman declines either to renew the leases or to sell, the College must be removed to other premises. The council therefore appeal for a sum of money to enable a freehold site to be purchased, and adequate buildings to be erected. Such a site has been found in a central and easily accessible position which would not be far from other academic centres, and which on this account is approved by the Senate of the University. Nearly one acre is at once available, and another acre could be added when funds allow. The council ask for a sum of £150,000 for the site and building, and already Lady Tate has come forward with an offer of £10,000 to erect and furnish with cases, a library to be called after her husband. The students' first contributions amount to £3,000, and there have been two offers of £1,000 each, one from Miss Shaen, besides lesser sums.

When the need for help to erect a college for women worthy of such a city as London and the English nation, is known and understood, surely a generous response will be given to this appeal.

Donations may be sent to the hon. secretary of the scheme, Miss H. Busk, 1, Gordon-square, London, W.C., who will gladly give any information required, or cheques may be sent to the National Provincial Bank of England, 52, Baker-street, London, W.

THE Session of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, in Manchester, was concluded on Tuesday by the public examinations, and the Visitors' Address delivered by the Rev. Philemon Moore. At the Valedictory Service in Cross-street Chapel in the evening, the address was delivered by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. On Wednesday a special meeting of the Alumni of the College was held, in promotion of the Jubilee Scheme, and a very successful garden party was held at Summerville. A report next week.

HUNGARY AND AUSTRIA.—II.

We are aware of how much human nature is inclined to trespass on rules and laws, and use, or rather abuse, its imaginary freedom. Most of us, faulty human creatures, as we are, know, and often see with our own eyes, how much we work against our own health, sometimes against our very life. It is enough to point to the passion of drinking. Now I will speak of a very common thing. Our desire to become rich gets perfectly dominant over all the rest. Rich and powerful people, as a rule, generally take no notice of the sources from which their riches come as long as their easy living is not disturbed.

Now, it is well-known here and elsewhere that Austria was in no way an advanced country in the middle of the eighteenth century. She had hardly any commerce, she had no flourishing industry. But that most courageous and wise queen, Maria Theresia, saw that without a strong industry a country is always a tributary to some other. She became the patron of her principalities, and with all the power in her royal hand, she began to create industry and commerce in Austria. Nobody, not even a soldier, was permitted to appear before her in a dress not prepared entirely in her own country. This zeal for the favourite Austria began to be felt in Hungary very soon, and it is the same now after more than a hundred years. The present members of the Austrian royal family, whose number is above 500, have several millions of their private property invested in the Austrian mills and machines, &c. They would never allow, as far as it was possible, anyone to build a gun factory in Hungary, so that there is not one place in Hungary where they could prepare anything for military purposes, except dresses.

The terrible conflict carried on between the Hungarian nation and the Austrian royal house is a great deal due to such minor considerations. Naturally the question of military power, and the position held by the present Emperor in the European concert is also very important, and we Hungarians understand it well, that the dynasty is not inclined to change the enjoyable present for a less agreeable one. But a nation with a long and glorious past and great power felt in the millions of cultured people and in her own lawful rights, must have her own, which is certainly of greater importance than anything else that may concern foreign people or families.

Unfortunately for us, those who live at a distance from Hungary can hardly see and realise our position, and may easily think that the Hungarians are simply an unruly people. Nothing of the kind! Those who see how we Hungarians bear with a boundless patience the absurd situation in which we are placed since the winter elections, must certainly admit that this nation is ready to rule herself. We were commanded to carry out an election to see what the nation wishes. Well, the election left the former governing party in a conspicuous minority, and, though four months have passed, we have no government to be supported by a parliamentary majority, because his Majesty has not been pleased to nominate one. Anyone may judge for himself that the old King's difficulty arises from the curious case that he is at the same time Emperor of Austria, and Hungary and Austria are allied for certain purposes.

What are they? Mutual defence against foreign enemies, consequently joint action in foreign affairs and war administration. These are called common affairs of the two countries. To provide for those affairs a common ministry of foreign affairs and of war was created, and it was agreed that the expenses of these two departments should be borne conjointly by the two countries. Though a common army is spoken of, one part of it is a Hungarian Army commanded and regulated by the King. Unfortunately for us Hungarians, when in 1867 this treaty was carried through, we had fallen back in many things, since after the war for independence in 1845-49 absolutism was forced on us for eighteen years, and we could not take one step of progress any way. When things changed in 1867 we hardly knew where to begin, and could not demand our rights, especially in the common affairs.

Now the chief question is about the common affairs, and especially about the use of the Magyar language in the Magyar part of the army, but it is not unlikely that the whole treaty will soon be reconsidered fundamentally, and just lately voices have been heard even in Austria demanding simply a personal union, i.e., perfect independence in everything except the person of the Emperor and King.

In conclusion, let me quote some remarks of Count of Apponyi:—"The unification of its domains was the constant aim of the dynasty. That aim could never be obtained, owing to the firmness with which our forefathers insisted on their independence. Of all opportunities the dynasty availed itself to the largest extent; while forced to reckon with the idea of Hungarian independence at home, it gave an entirely new Austrian character to diplomacy and to all foreign action. That lasted for two centuries, and fixed an impression of foreign opinion in a direction which can be modified only through impressions of an opposite kind working for a considerable time. A wholesome reform of those misleading forms in foreign matters has not yet been effected, though it has begun, and no doubt will be completed in time . . ."

One word more. Count Apponyi concludes his very important address:—"I should not like to be misunderstood. My strong insistance, my whole country's insistance, on her national independence, does not in the least imply a will or a wish to break away from Austria. We mean to keep faith to the reigning dynasty—no nation is more absolutely reliable in that respect; we mean loyally to fulfil our compact of mutual defence with Austria. . . . All we want is that equal faith should be left to us, that those equally binding enactments of the Pragmatic sanction, which made Hungary secure of her independence as a sovereign nation, as a kingdom, nulli alio regno vel populo subditum, as the law of 1791 puts it, should be fulfilled with equal loyalty.

OBITUARY.

MR. C. F. DEAR.

Following closely on the loss of our faithful friend and fellow-worker, J. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, another generous soul has passed on to the higher life in the person of Clement F. Dear, the temporary minister of the High-street Chapel, Portsmouth. After visiting, a few days ago, some aged members of his congregation, reading some stories to a sweet child on his knee, he just stepped into his study, was seized with apoplexy and died immediately. "In harness," he often said he should like to die, and so he did.

From the Government Army Service Mr. Dear retired a few years ago, after completing with honour and distinction his full term of office. In early years he thought his way out from orthodoxy, and became an earnest Unitarian, one of Robert Spear's "Robust Unitarians."

In Essex, before he relinquished his military life, Mr. Dear was constantly engaged as a lay preacher among the churches in the county. Preaching to him was a passion and a delight. His services were constantly sought, and his visits always attracted good congregations. At Halstead, Chelmsford, and other churches, he is remembered with grateful affection. When he retired from the Army he was induced to take the oversight of the church at Southend. For three or four years he maintained with efficiency the ministry of the church, at the same time interesting himself in all questions affecting the welfare of the town. He was a constant contributor to the local press, and, being naturally of a militant spirit, he entered into controversy with a ready and willing mind. For some time he was a member of the committee of the Eastern Union and also of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, and ever manifested a deep interest in the welfare of the small and struggling churches. It was on June 27 that he passed away at his home in Southsea, being only 53 years of age. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. George Lansdown, of Billingshurst, who on Sunday last at the High-street Chapel, rendered very acceptable service.

MR. THOMAS BIRCHALL, J.P.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. Thomas Birchall, J.P., of Warrington. He passed away after a lingering period of weakness on June 29 in his 75th year. He had been identified with Cairo-street Chapel from his boyhood, being one of the group of young men who came strongly under the influence of Dr. Philip Carpenter. As with others, it was an influence which lasted for a life-time and was seen in his keen interest in the welfare of his native town. When he was thirteen years of age he listened to Cobden in the Warrington market place denouncing the Corn Laws, and from that time he never wavered in his popular sympathies and his earnest and progressive liberalism. With a number of other young men connected with the Cairo-street Sunday-school he promoted the foundation of the local Co-operative Society, and for an unbroken period of forty years he was its president, watching over the development and growing prosperity of the Society with unflagging energy As a co-operator he was widely known, and was a member of the committee of the central Wholesale Society. At the morning service in Cairo-street Chapel last Sunday, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of All Souls' Church, Belfast, spoke of his long and faithful membership of the congregation in the following terms :—"He was faithful in his attachment to this place. He loved its traditions ; he loved the simple message of Divine Love and Christian Discipleship which he heard within its walls. His memory often lingered round his own early recollections, and especially round the figure of the venerated teacher of his own boyhood, whose name was often on his lips. Succeeding ministers found in him a staunch and kindly friend, who never failed in his interest in their work. It is not too much to say—he would have been the first to acknowledge it—that it was here that he found the inspiration for the discharge of public duty, and for every honourable position of usefulness which he has been called upon to fill. We shall all feel how fitting are the words when applied to him, "Lord, I love the habitation of thy house, and this place where thy glory dwelleth." The funeral took place on Monday. A service was held in Cairo-street Chapel, conducted by the Revs. C. Harvey Cook and W. H. Drummond, and afterwards at the graveside in the presence of a large company of his friends and fellow-townsmen, the committal service was read by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. The attendance of the Mayor and Corporation, the magistrates, and of numerous deputations from public bodies, was an impressive testimony of the personal respect in which Mr. Birchall was held and the value of his public work.

REAFFORESTING has been carried out with some success in the Midlands. Reeds Wood Park, planted by the Corporation of Walsall, was formerly a series of desolate refuse heaps, and is now a well-wooded attractive retreat; the trees are many of them large, and there are open spaces where hay is grown. Another example of the transformation that is possible is Horsefield Gorse Wood, which was planted twenty-five years ago on levelled pit banks. It is now a thicket of trees, and wild roses are found growing there. It is stated that no indications of pit-banks remain. The Midland Reafforesting Association has several branches which are engaged usefully in reclaiming some of the many desolate areas in the midland "Black Country." Five thousand trees have been planted at Riddings Lane, Wednesbury, and forty-two acres of pit bank at Moxley have been handed over to the Association recently.

THE Annual Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition is to be held at Blackfriars Mission, Stamford-street, on Tuesday and Wednesday next, July 11 and 12. The exhibition will be opened by Lady Durning-Lawrence on Tuesday evening at 8, and on Wednesday at 8 by Mr. C. F. Pearson, President of the B. and F.U.A.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE TWO STONES.—II.

WINTER passed, and spring came with gentler rain and more frequent sunshine, and the valley was spanned by April rainbows. The stones felt the shadows of the swallows as they skimmed homeward above the water. Tender green leaves burst their sticky brown sheaths which dropped into the river, and went sailing down like a fairy fleet of new-pitched boats. Like a fairy fleet also were the white blossoms of the water buttercups, riding anchored by their stems, and drifting with the current as far as their green moorings allowed. Summer decked the river-banks with roses and meadow-sweet. The river ran so low that the wagtails crossed without wetting their toes. The rocks shimmered in the heat. Then autumn painted the leaves red, and yellow, and golden brown, and filled the valley with her bountiful fruits. So the seasons rolled on, and the years, and so rolled on the river, hastening, ever hastening, its pebbly host along.

Gradually the two stones began to make their way less easily than at first. They now often missed being "ready for the next move," to their own and their neighbours' great confusion. If only they could be still for a moment to rest their aching sides! If only they could be sure that there was some satisfactory end to their difficult journey!

One day a pebble approached, and noticing their listlessness, asked what was the matter. Now there was something in his worn grey look with just a little polish to brighten it, that made them feel they could talk to him, as they had done to the boulder.

"So you have got to that, have you? Grinding is hard work, and bustling is monotonous! But don't you feel cheered to be helping in a great and noble plan?"

"A great and noble plan!" repeated both the stones at once.

"Yes, of which this valley, shaped by the ice-river and the boulders, is a part, and which includes also the river-bed we are carving: in short, everything we can see."

"We are carving the river-bed!" exclaimed the pebbles in surprise.

"Yes," laughed their friend. "Haven't you noticed that the further we go sliding and scraping the wider flows the river?"

"Then that was what the boulder meant, when he talked of wonders and changes never ceasing, and of our time coming sooner than we expected," said one of the stones. "But shall we ever rest as he did?"

"That I cannot tell," replied the worn grey stone. "However, I am inclined to believe the swallows. They fly high, and meet with those who fly still higher, and all the birds sing that earth, and sky and water are filled with an Almighty Power, who created them, and who makes these wonders and changes, but guides all things with love, else how could birds travel so far, sure of always finding home, and happy year after year to love and care for nestlings? It must be this great good Power that put us here, and I am sure whatever happens it will be well with us if we push forward, and help our neighbours along in the best way we know."

The two stones felt differently about themselves and the river-bed after this, and spun along as they had never spun before. When they were disheartened, they, too, listened to the birds, and tried to look at life in the river-bed from the point of view of those who flitted above it.

One winter they arrived at a part of the river where stood some rocks large enough to break the water into narrow torrents. The stream swept swirling and eddying beyond, chafing at the interference. Several pebbles with one of the two stones were carried into the circling currents. Exciting and giddy work it was, and they quite enjoyed it, till they found that here was more jarring and grating than ever, by reason of the rock below, in which each stone, while coursing round, actually ground a little hole, wherein the water sent them spinning deeper and deeper at every turn. Then, when settled down in their respective eddies for a steady round of grinding, they perversely bemoaned their "useless isolation" from the busy company in the great river-bed. Judge, then, the surprise of our friend from the rocky shelf, when on the subsidence of the water, men talked and wondered nearly as much about him as about the boulder.

And what became of the second stone? He in his turn, with some other pebbles, left the river-bed. For one day he lay high and dry upon one of the terraces, which rose above either bank. The stone and his companions told their story to the wisest. How, in the course of many years, the water had, during flood-time, laid down on both banks a great deal of the gravel and sand let loose by wear and tear of its rocky channel, so that it ran upon a level, soft bed curtained by the steep tree-clad sides of the valley. How in time it had cut away pieces of this level, forming newer levels lower down, which in their turn were sliced away, thus making a succession of platforms—wonders and changes in the valley which it would have been impossible to explain, had not the river-pebbles been found on the topmost terrace.

Thus the seasons rolled on, and the years, and still rolled on the river. But now the two stones lay, the one on his great river terrace, the other in his humble "pot-hole" carved out by his own endeavour yet both with the soft vegetation and the free air around, and a stillness over them such as they had never felt since they left the peaceful ledge. Both were sure that something had worked for good in the midst of hard times, fears, and frictions. Both knew, as the boulder said, that there had been a corner in the world for them to fill, and that having done their best to fill it, whatever might betide, it would, in the words of the worn grey stone, "still be well" with them. For were not they, as well as the boulder and the birds, and all created things, revelations of God in whom we all "live and move and have our being," and of our Heavenly Father whose "love never faileth"?

THE COLLEGE IDEAL.

THE Visitor's address given last week at Manchester College by the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED set before the students some of the essential things in their work of preparation for the ministry. That which is most essential of all, he said, no college can give. It is a matter of personal dedication, of the discipline of character and self-determination on the part of the man who gives the first place to the moral and spiritual values of life and devotes himself directly to making them effective in his own life and the lives of others. The actual work of the College was described as being not so much education as instruction—instruction in theology, interpreted in the broadest manner—though education must certainly go on through the whole course of that instruction. And then the ideal of scholarship was set forth with its watch-word, "Verify your references," enforced by vivid illustration, in its wider bearings upon the whole range of character and the service of a minister's life.

Perhaps we have not fully grasped the purpose of Mr. WICKSTEED'S address. The report we have furnished gives only a meagre account of what it contained; but when it is published in its complete form, as it soon will be, our readers will be able to return to its consideration. It was certainly a quickening and stimulating address, as it was described by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD in proposing a vote of thanks at the Trustees' meeting; and it has set us thinking of what the ideal college ought to do for men preparing for the ministry.

Such a college must certainly train scholars, and through the influence of its teachers and the spirit and method of their instruction, keep the pure love of truth and devotion to thorough work burning in their students' hearts. And if the instruction within the time available for any college course can only cover a very limited range, the things of most vital consequence will be made clear, the true foundations will be laid for what must be a life-long pursuit for every genuine student; and no minister, in these days, ought to be content, if he do not take with him through all his working years the spirit of the student also, eagerly alive to the movements of thought, and doing his own part in the service of truth.

It might be a legitimate subject for discussion, Mr. WICKSTEED said in his address, what were the most necessary subjects of instruction for a student preparing for the ministry. All will be agreed that an adequate survey of the grounds and truths of religion must be set before him, that he may have a firm grasp of the most vital questions of religious thought and of ethical principle, on which the inspiration of his ministry must be based. Nor will the comparative study of religions be neglected, that he may have a broad outlook and sympathetic insight into other forms of faith, with the clearer understanding and the more earnest grasp of the truth which has possessed his own soul. During a three or four years' course in such a college, while the student must be well grounded in the critical method and gain some insight into the work of the specialist, he surely ought to have been made to feel the power for inspiration that there is in the Bible and in other great books of religious literature, that the true life in them may be throbbing in his heart, and he may know into how great an inheritance he is entering as a teacher of the people. No mazes of technical scholarship must be allowed to keep him from the inspiration of the prophets of Israel, the steadfastness of the Law, the pure devotion of the Psalms, nor from living communion with that supreme life of which the record is in the Gospels and the quickening power in the whole of the New Testament literature. A prophetic teacher will have made the Epistles live and burn in his students' hearts, and so will it be with other great books of devotion and moral appeal, and with the history of the church, especially the history of religion among our own people. And while these subjects have their full measure of attention, it may not be forgotten that religion is concerned with the actual life of the people, with present day conditions, with principles of sound government and administration, and healthy social life, with all efforts of moral and social reform. These may not be lost sight of in the student's course, and both history and economics ought to be brought to bear on the due preparation for his life-work. With these must go the training of the speaker, in the power of strong and chastened utterance, of lucid statement and effective argument and appeal, all of which is subject to the control of wise and steady discipline, where a student for the ministry is in earnest in his desire really to fit himself for his high calling.

Much else there is that a college can give, while the regular courses of instruction proceed, if it is happy in the possession of living teachers. They must be in close touch with the life of the people, with the movements of thought and the moral efforts, sympathies, and aspirations of the time, and with the churches in which the work of the ministry is carried on, for which their students are preparing. Then their work will have its best effect, and in the quiet of the college life there will be nurtured a veritable "school of the prophets." So Mr. WICKSTEED has set us thinking, and such thoughts run out into practical applications, whereby in our actual college work we may get nearer to the ideal.

DR. JOHN HUNTER'S Sunday morning services at the Bechstein Hall, are attended by increasingly large congregations. To-morrow (Sunday) evening, Dr. Hunter is also preaching at the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, Kentish Town, in connection with the celebration of the jubilee of the church. The service begins at seven o'clock. The Free Christian Church was established, and opened on July 5, 1855, by the Rev. W. Forster, who had come out from a Congregational Church into that larger liberty. A report of the jubilee meeting of the congregation will be found among our News from the Churches.

THE Rev. F. A. Russell, formerly of Liverpool, and more recently of York, enters to-morrow (Sunday) on his ministry at the King's Weigh House Church, Grosvenor-square, where he has succeeded Dr. John Hunter. In his letter, dated June 13, accepting the invitation of the church and congregation, Mr. Russell says:—"I wish to preserve most jealously the Catholicity by which our Church has been distinguished. I shall endeavour in every legitimate way to make our Church a home for all who feel the spell of things unseen and eternal. I pray, as a son of the Catholic Church, that ours may be a Catholicity of Love, as well as of intellect, and I trust that we shall think of 'all manners and conditions of men and women,' and labour zealously for their good. Anything less than that is beneath our common Christianity, and is only a poor Sectarianism and Pharisaism of the world. Freely we have received; let us freely give."

WE regret to hear of the death of the Rev. Charles Derzsi, who came as the Hungarian student to Manchester College, then in London, in 1872, remaining for two years. Mr. Derzsi was the first minister of the Budapest Unitarian Church, and had latterly been engaged in teaching at Torda, where he died, after a long and severe illness, on June 7.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

THE annual proceedings at the close of the session took place at the College on Thursday, June 29. The morning began with a brief service in the chapel, and a sermon by Mr. C. M. Wright, B.A., followed by the reading in the lecture-room of passages from essays and examination papers by other of the senior students, Messrs. A. Golland, M.A., A. Thornhill, B.A., Dr. György, Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar, and Mr. Stanley Mellor, B.A. (a first year student), and then another sermon in the chapel by Mr. J. P. Davies, B.A., the senior student. At half-past eleven the Visitor's Address was given by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., and in the afternoon the Trustees' Meeting was held. In the evening there was the usual Valedictory service for the students leaving college.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

"Preparation for the Ministry" was the subject of Mr. Wicksteed's address, and it dealt first with the preparation of character, and then with the ideal of scholarship. No study of technical science, he said, and no college could produce what was the most essential thing in preparation for the ministry. Those who declared their intention of entering the ministry made no profession of higher moral and spiritual excellence than the average man, but they proclaimed a certain relative estimate of the values of things. They declared that the spiritual and moral side of things had so impressed itself upon them that they desired to make it dominant in their own lives, not only in the hierarchy of motives in their own conscience, but to make it direct the outward form of their life, and the work they meant to do. To prepare for the ministry they had to get their own lives, down to their inmost thought and aspiration, into deliberate relation to that scale of preferences. That could be done under any circumstances and conditions, and while obviously there might be a deepening of the hold on the significance of moral and spiritual things, and such preparation might be strengthened indefinitely by the character of the master, and the nature of the occupations with which they came into contact, it could not be a matter of deliberate instruction. No earthly institution could undertake to furnish such preparation for the ministry; no institution could be so bad as not to allow the men in it to train themselves for it.

There were many other things required besides the spirit in which they had to go to work. A minister ought to be a man of business aptitudes, of tact, judgment, severe self-restraint as well as frankness of self-utterance, fearless and industrious, feeling the responsibility to himself, to his flock, and to God; there was no machinery of supervision over him, he must be his own disciplinarian, and that would require moral strength and effort. All those things must be added to the fundamental preparation for the ministry, and an ideal collegiate institution might do something to that end, but not much. A college could only take a subordinate place in such education. The best kind was to be had everywhere by those who were capable of being educated, for Life was the great school. It was only on the intellectual side that they could expect any college to be of direct and exceptional power. The best of education came not directly, but incidentally with the thing that was in hand. The direct purpose of a college must be, in the main, not education, but instruction; and that College undertook to give instruction in theology.

Of recent years they had passed through various phases in regard to Biblical studies. At one time it was thought that they had done with the Bible, and religion would in future be based on science; then it was urged that sociology must be the foundation, and now it seemed to be psychology. But while these had been chasing one another across the field, the significance of religious literature and history had been abiding. There was a wide field of legitimate questioning as to the best kind of intellectual training for the ministry; but he wished to call their special attention to an aspect of the intellectual life independent of this special subject; and that was the ideal of scholarship. The scholarly habit of mind he defined as a due sense of the responsibility involved in making a statement. A man with little knowledge, and not in any sense a technical scholar, might have that temper of mind; and on the other hand, the whole system of examinations and ranking by the result of examinations appeared to him an open defiance of the spirit of scholarship, an undermining of the sense of responsibility in making statements. A sound-minded, shrewd peasant had usually a more exact sense of responsibility in making a statement than a finished scholar. He often thought of the peasant whom Canon Rawnsley interviewed on the subject of the Wordsworths' ways. He had been an outdoor servant, and when questioned on the subject he said: "They were very pleasant together"; but then checking himself, added: "at least out of doors they were." He had not the least intention of making dark insinuations, but it occurred to him that he had made a statement wider in reach than his experience had warranted, so he checked his statement. The man who could gain any wide command of facts at second hand and attain the virgin purity of that scholarly habit which he ventured to attribute to the Cumberland peasant, was what he called a scholar.

The whole matter was in that very well-worn and well-known word of advice to the student, Verify your references. Then they would have the scholarly habit of mind, which concerned not the student only but every man, and the minister of religion perhaps most deeply of all. The habit once formed would relentlessly pursue him and make him satisfied with nothing but the supreme form of sincerity and fidelity. The man who had that great habit would not readily take up a malicious tale, and would be immune from that kind of paltry gossip and intrigue which was always liable to rise wherever there was gathered together a small and close fellowship of men in intimate relations with each other, unchecked by broad and deep universal interests. Some of the finest traits of tact and moral judgment, of intellectual and moral purity, of immunity from the taint of a polluted atmosphere, and the habit of generosity, would spring as a direct result from the scholarly habit of checking references. Another result on the deepest side of their work of preparation was that a man gradually acquired a certain chastity and restraint of spirit, and did not wish to make the most vivid appeal to the emotions of his hearers, but to quicken their spiritual sense. He became suspicious of any expression of emotion deeper than his actual feeling. He learnt to stand guard over his emotions and to be more careful not to overstate than not to understate them. He learnt that the habitual attitude of the man with an enthusiasm, a passion, was self-restraint, not self-stimulus. He would rely for his power on the gradual gathering of unceasing efforts to bring himself into harmony with his ideals, perpetual association with minds of the highest and noblest range. He would have learnt the folly of looking for quick returns in the shape of bustling activities of the day, at the expense of drinking of the deep and still waters. There would gather in his mind a volume of emotion, of association, which needed control, not lashing. And the same man, who had begun by checking his references, would end by feeling that it was a blasphemy to try to make anyone feel more in his words than he felt in himself.

THE TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The annual summer meeting of Trustees was held in the afternoon in the library, the President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, in the chair. Among those present, in addition to the College staff and those mentioned below as taking part in the meeting were Messrs. David Ainsworth, R. D. Darbishire, R. Harrop, S. B. Worthington and A. W. Worthington, the Revs. F. K. Freeston, R. T. Herford, and J. J. Wright. The Rev. C. C. Coe was present for the first time as Visitor, having been appointed to that office in succession to the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong.

The minutes of the annual meeting in January, and the catch words of the minutes of subsequent committee meetings, were read by Mr. A. H. Worthington, the lay secretary.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE moved, and Mr. WILLIAM LONG seconded, a resolution of grateful acknowledgment to the Principal, Professors, and Lecturers for their services to the College, both speakers saying that the resolution was by no means a matter of form, but one which they passed every year with very sincere gratitude.

Dr. DRUMMOND acknowledged the resolution.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD moved a vote of thanks to the Visitors for their services, and to the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed for his address—a "quickening and stimulating address". Mr. Wood called it—with the request that he would allow it to be printed for circulation among the Trustees.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded the resolution, which Mr. WICKSTEED acknowledged, and said he would endeavour to recover his address (it was not written) in response to that request.

The students then came in, and the President presented certificates to those who had completed their course, and also the essay prizes and Daniel Jones grants.

The Russell Martineau prize for Hebrew was awarded to Mr. A. Thornhill, and it was mentioned that in the course of the session Mr. J. P. Davies had won in the University the Hall and Houghton prize for Syriac. Mr. Davies and Mr. Thornhill both obtained First Class Honours in Old and New Testament subjects, and Mr. Thornhill gained a prize for an essay on the "Pauline Theology." To Mr. Sukhtankar prizes were awarded for his essays on "The Knowledge of Good and Evil," and "The Passage of Buddhism from a system of Ethical Culture into Theism." Mr. Stanley Mellor and Mr. F. Sinclair also received essay prizes.

Of the four leaving students who have completed their full theological course, Mr. J. P. Davies is continuing his studies as a Hibbert scholar, Mr. Thornhill is going as minister to Carlisle, Mr. Golland to be assistant minister with the Rev. F. K. Freeston at Essex Church, Kensington, and the Rev. C. M. Wright assistant minister with the Rev. Joseph Wood at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham. Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar, having completed two years' study at Manchester College, is going with a grant from the Hibbert Trust for a year to Germany, first for a few weeks to Marburg, and then for the University session to Kiel, before returning to India. Dr. György, after two years at Oxford, returns to Hungary.

Mr. Yoshimoto, the Japanese student, as was reported at the time, was unfortunately obliged by the state of his health to return home quite early in the session, without completing his term of study.

The four first year theological students—Messrs. Felix Holt, B.A., Stanley Mellor, B.A., F. Sinclaire, M.A. (of New Zealand), and W. E. Williams, B.A.—are continuing their course, Mr. Mellor being appointed senior student for the new session.

The Principal announced that the students were to reassemble on Saturday, Oct. 14, at 9 a.m., and the opening address for the new session would be given on Monday afternoon, Oct. 16. The address will be given at five o'clock as usual, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. G. H. Leigh, and seconded by Mr. F. W. Monks, brought the meeting to a close.

THE VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

The Valedictory service for the students leaving college was held in the evening, in the chapel. The devotional part of the service, which began with the hymn, "Come, Kingdom of our God," was conducted by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, who read as lessons passages from Isaiah xl. and Matth. xxiv. and xxv., beginning, "Watch, therefore."

Dr. Drummond gave the address of farewell on behalf of the College, in the course of which he spoke of the freedom they had inherited, and in which their work was carried on. The College had passed through great changes of thought, exercising fearless criticism of dogmas, but the fervour of its religion had never cooled, genuine reverence had not been violated. Its inquiries had been carried on in the spirit of scholarly discussion, not of hostile attack, its end being always truth. They had unquenchable faith that truth must be something higher and not lower than current opinion, and that truth a man found for himself would have far more effect on his character than what he received on command and did not behold with his own purified sight. Freedom was not destructive of religion, but a condition of their drawing nearer to the realities of God, and seeing those deep things of the Spirit that endure and become more luminous with the advance of knowledge and the changes of thought. That freedom was happily no monopoly of their own; even in England the modern universities were establishing theological faculties on that basis, while ignorance began to tremble for its dominance, and resorted to bluster and calumny. They were told that the Higher Criticism was bankrupt; but if so, it was a fatal blow to historical Christianity. Even the mistakes of great scholars had led to progress, and by the work of such men as Strauss, Baur, and Renan, their whole outlook had been changed from what it was a century ago. The modern view was less mechanical and more spiritual. They saw less of the miraculous and more of the directing Spirit of God. Christianity was not a unique exception, but the consummation of the great world-process, the highest manifestation of the spiritual laws which governed mankind, and the Divine love which had instituted these laws and through them worked on the human heart. It should never be forgotten that both the lower and the higher criticism were for the sake of a criticism higher still. The lower textual criticism gave them the text, the higher gave them knowledge of authorship, and of the surroundings of the authors, their problems and objects, but these investigations were preliminary to interpretation, without which they would have no fruitful result. The highest criticism of a book exhibited the beauty, order, and significance of its thought and brought the author's mind to light. Such revealing interpretation was the highest of all. The historical method had thrown a flood of light on the scriptures and given them a higher value. In the case of the Apostle Paul, certain elements of thought had been discarded, yet that criticism had admitted them to the heart of the great apostle, and brought forth profound spiritual principles hidden from the old dogmatic interpretation. For such criticism they needed not only clear intellectual vision, but the insight of spiritual sympathy. So the ancient writings had a stronger influence on their lives and enabled them to discern more clearly the deeper working of the Spirit of God in themselves and in the men and women around them. Apart from the constructive power of historical imagination and spiritual sympathy, they would be far astray, and there was still much to be done to rescue the Bible from degradation and bring it into the light of genuine human experience, drawing forth its eternal principles and applying them to the conditions of modern life. That would be their highest task, and so only could they fulfil the highest work of criticism. In the name of the College he bade them a cordial farewell.

Then followed Washington Gladden's hymn—

> O Master, may I walk with Thee,
> In lowly paths of service free, after which the Rev. W. G. Tarrant gave the Welcome into the Ministry, which is printed in full in our present issue.

"Pour, blessed gospel, glorious news for man," was the concluding hymn of the service.

WELCOME TO THE MINISTRY. *

By the Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

It is allotted to me, in accordance with your own desire, gentlemen, to offer you a welcome into the ministry. It is a duty which I readily embrace; for who, being engaged in this ministry, and having perceived from year to year with growing conviction its deep significance, can feel other than the warmest interest in all young recruits that join the ranks, and the sincerest joy in their self-consecration, You are saying farewell to your College, and the untrodden path of active service lies before you. It is a turning point in your life, a consummation which is at the same time a new beginning, an event full of meaning for yourselves, and fraught with the gravest consequences to others—perhaps many others—certainly more than you are likely to know. If at such a moment a word can be said to help, to strengthen, to enlighten and purify your spiritual vision, and to send you to your respective posts of duty, with minds resolute, devoted, and reassured, it will be indeed a word in season. May such word be granted us.

Happily, we do not meet to-day as strangers. It is one of the compensations of belonging to a little army that we the sooner get to know one another. If our numbers were greater our intimacy must be less. I cannot bring you the flattering prestige of episcopal benediction, but I offer the hand of a comrade and a friend. Even had we not met hitherto, there could have been no hesitation on my part in thus accepting you, as it were, from the hands of your revered Principal, as the latest fruit of mutual toils during these years of study. But I rejoice to have had opportunity of some all too brief intercourse with you, and to have seen a little way into the working of your mind. Thus heartily on my own behalf I greet every one of you, my brothers, and bid you welcome to that work for which I know you have been longing and waiting with all your soul.

But the welcome I have to offer far exceeds the limits of personal interest. I speak to you to-night in the name of men distant and near, older and younger, whose ranks you join to-night; by whose side, untried as you are, but greatly believed in, you will be trusted to stand as worthy allies; whose labours and responsibilities you will share; whose work you will be called upon not only to maintain, but to extend; and who will leave their good name, and that of the faith they live for, to your keeping, when they grow old and drop away. In the name of all these, our fathers and brethren, I welcome you to their company. And not in the name of the living only do I speak. This place of prayer is not old; it seems but yesterday that its doors first opened to the worshipping crowd on that memorable day not yet twelve years ago; yet already the hallowing memories of departed members of that happy company add, one by one, to a consecration not of ritual, but of life and love. Thus it has been in all the decades past, and thus it shall be. Young souls, now setting forth, remember, I earnestly pray you, the lineage whence you spring, the leaders whom you follow. From all sides we seem to be shone upon by serious, intelligent, and sainted faces. The air is full of echoes of voices that still speak to us. A noble army has led the way. On the peaceful field they won we bivouac to-night, it is to the renewal of their battle for truth and right, for justice, freedom, and the higher life that we shall wake to-morrow. Dear names and honoured, the names of our own begetters in the faith, and of those who begot them, a spiritual ancestry of whom we speak with a tender and honest pride,—God forbid that any wilfulness or negligence in us should ever impair the effect of their work for us, and through us for mankind!

And yet more, I speak (all unworthy as I am) in the name of that wider fellowship to which our fathers in the faith never ceased to belong, in which they eagerly claimed to share, even in the heat and strife of controversy. All servants of the truth work together even when their present conceptions of it are most opposed. This you know well, it is part of the gospel you mean to proclaim; but, realising it to-night, see what it involves. Possibly, the narrower view held by some would exclude you from the ranks of this clergy or that priesthood, but you have yourselves received too much from men in and outside of all the churches not to feel your heart at one with them; and still above the din of the sectional strife we hear a Voice that rebukes all the mistakes of excommunicating zeal, the Voice that says for our comfort, through the ages, from century to century:—"He that is not against us is for us." My brothers, it is, very humbly but confidently, in the name of all God's ministry, of all the past, as well as of the present, of all lands as well as our own, that I call you upward to your place among them.

Surely there is an effectual consecration for us in the thought of that great host, in the remembrance of the eager movement of their strong minds, and the yearning of their loving hearts. Did they not always, in their day, feel with us, that the labourers were all too few for so bountiful a harvest? For them, as shall be for us, the hours of the day were all too short before the sounding of the evening bell. They have gone, but not wholly. Let science explain it how it may, the dead still work with the hand of the living, and mingle their accents with the voices we hear around us. Welcome, my friends, into this spirit-stream, this endless, boundless flow of energy, that streams upon the desert places of the world, and makes the wilderness blossom like the rose! To whatever race you belong in this ministry, all are spirit brothers. With whatever special gifts you come, gifts of brain, and tongue, and heart, there is need of everyone. Come up higher, then, my friends, into a full share of all the best activity of which your nature is capable.

You have often been reminded, you have yourselves perceived, and are well convinced, that a special art is involved in the kind of service you seek to render to God and man. All men truly are called to serve, in their own way, but upon the minister rests this heavy responsibility—that whether they will attend to the call depends often and largely upon him through whom the call is specially made. During these years now closed you have been seeking, and I hope finding, some useful guidance in the principles and rules of the art which you must now practise as summoners of souls. We know that random, undisciplined effort, however well-meant, would certainly not succeed in the arts of painting and sculpture; it is not likely to be more successful in dealing with the man which the picture and the statue can, at best, only suggest and shadow forth. To that measure of intellectual training appropriate to all who would be intelligent citizens, you have added exercises peculiarly suited to the kind of work you have before you. It is well done. But on this critical occasion I am here to tell you that whatever you may have learned by tuition, or experiment, is worth nothing except as a beginning of never-completed learning. "I count not myself yet to have attained," is the language of the aged and long-experienced apostle. It is true of all your learning—critical, philosophical, practical; you know nothing worth knowing about preaching, for example, unless what you have learned makes you eager to learn more. I speak especially of this, not because it is the whole, but because this is your special work. It is a branch of art capable of unlimited progress. True, as we may hopefully and gratefully remember, a man may be useful in the pulpit even with lowly powers, if he be sincere. But think of the high demands made upon you, think of your immeasureable possibilities! Reflect on what is implied in your being set there before a company of your fellow-creatures, to speak upon the matters of the inner life. Think of their varied experiences, their different needs. Remember, especially, their paramount need of being delivered from make-believe. Remember the extreme readiness of people, when they see it is a preacher who is speaking, to take what he says as "preaching," and nothing more. And yet, all the while, remember the truly infinite capacity of every man for mental and spiritual progress, if only you, their accepted leader, can guide aright their thoughts and feelings. Ponder upon the secrets of the heart, their secrets known to you very much through your own—secrets of hope, fear, struggle, defeat, sin, penitence, prayer—ponder on these things, and pray with your whole soul to be delivered from the temptation ever to think lightly of your work, or niggardly of its opportunities. Daily magnify your office—not the officer! Think of yourself as lowly as you must when you are in your right mind; but remember always that your ministry, like everything else, from an operation in mechanics to the germination of a seed, is for ever greater than we know. The word to you is, "Launch out into the deep." Be assured that in every mind there is something that will respond to the very best you have to offer, if only you offer it in the right way. The soul of man grows elate with the revelation of its affinity to things divine. A bird will not more readily use its wings than the mind its powers, once it is roused from lethargy. Gladly, if sometimes uncomfortably, men receive the surprise that we are all nearer to divineness than we usually dream. Men do, indeed, spend too much of their time in trivialities. They are content too long with the shallow waters. You are there to provoke the soul's ambitions, to open the harbour gates, and lead the fleet of idle and profitless boats out into the wider sea. Not only courage and good intention, but skill and intrepid faith are needed for this navigation. Are you ready to take the lead thus? To be willing is much—but ready?

If the minister were thoroughly well-equipped, if he went to his work (as he ought) with his heart tender, his mind clear, and his body at its maximum health, all occasions would serve him with tools in his craft. God forgive us, what blind eyes we have, what slow wits, and stammering tongues! Else with what different utterance we should go to men. How rich, how copious our resources! Were we preachers indeed, with St. Bernard, Shakespeare, and Wordsworth we should daily be finding tongues in trees, sermons in stones, and good in everything. With the zealous—and I know not why "old-fashioned"—Gospel reader we should find new openings in every chapter, and in almost every verse. In the sweet familiar ways of home and friendship we should catch tones of an Eternal Love that would have us speak always in harmony with itself. With the student of social science we should hear Sinai thunders in these wrecked lives and squalid homes, that cry out, in city and village, against us in our culpable ignorance and selfish indulgence. With the investigator of the myriad forms of life we should marvel afresh at the problems of nature's economy. With the experiments with "mere matter" we should find ourselves led on and on, from mystery to mystery, into unexpected communication with the one besetting Holy Spirit, whose is all order, all motion, all beauty, all truth. Are you ready so to set the wide and glorious world in its splendour and sanctity before those waiting minds, so as to focus the image of the outward splendour there in search of an answering loveliness from within, that the listless shall be allured, the careless subdued, the faithless convinced, the joyless comforted, the loveless redeemed, and all brought to a keen delight in the law of the Lord, all quickened for the service of what is good, all touched anew with the energy and blessed with the peace divine? If so, you are ready to be a preacher, and so to preach that all will be ready to sing and pray. If you can but plead your heart's desire that, if it be possible, in some such way, truly in whatever degree, you may help mankind, if you can truly affirm that this, and no self-seeking in any form, is your firm resolve, God helping you, you are ready to be made the preacher which He is ready to make of you.

The form of my appeal to you (which is, I think, none other, substantially, than your appeal to yourselves) must surely have called up in your minds a reminiscence of that Gospel scene, where the young disciples, James and John, showed themselves to be ambitious for great honours, yet not unwilling, if need be, to risk great sorrows. "Are ye able to drink of the cup?" "Yea, we are able." Who of us dare say so much? Listen: "The cup that I drink, ye shall drink." Pregnant word for them and for us. As to the "honours" sought, they can be no human apportionment; all that shall be as the Father wills. But as to the "cup" of trial, disappointment, and sorrow—a sorrow that seems at times even unto death—there is no uncertainty about that. I welcome you to drink of that "cup." You have embraced no light task, as we have seen; and, even if you could take it lightly, a stern but salutary penalty would but increase the troubles inevitable in your lot. You come forward in manly sincerity, but your sincerity will be tested in the coming years, not only in work, but in patience. Through and through this ministry will assay you and show what mint you are of. You shall be tested by the possibilities of good service, in and out of the pulpit, which you either will or will not fulfil. You shall be tested by problems alike of theory and practice; by the bewildering mass and variety of human needs, of the old, the young, the rich, the poor, that your feeble hands must attempt to help; by an often recurring sense of failure; by the confessed weakness that is very near to despair. You shall be tested by poverty, probably; by misconception, almost certainly; by neglect, apparent or real; by utter loneliness of spirit. I tell you these things before they come to pass. It is not a question here of your profession of ability to endure; being once in you must endure. You think you have counted the cost; I hope so. Yet to pay is after all more than to reckon up; and the months and years will have to be lived through very bravely and very patiently. One wonders how he should dare to "welcome" a young man into this calling. I speak not now specially of what is called "worldly reward." That has its due place in a wise man's thought—woe to us if it takes an undue place there. I speak not of the peculiar embarrassments of the ministry in a Free Church, the special worries of a self-worrying community that rarely seems at liberty to taste and see how gracious the Lord is. But looking at the prevalent, or at least the most obvious, dispositions of men in our time, the sceptical trend of opinion among the cultured, the pleasure-seeking of the well-to-do, and the sordid apathy of the multitude, what a quixotic thing it seems for any man to choose this career! If it has not chosen you, you are making a great mistake. To what is it I welcome you? It is to the way of the cross. Make no mistake about that, my brothers, least of all the mistake that you have secured in the ministry an easy profession and a comfortable lot. Brace yourselves to bear, to grapple, earnestly and long, with the grim wrestler in the dark; to be a true full-natured man in man's world, and by your life, as much as by any word of yours, to proclaim the Gospel of God, and the strenuous climb of man upwards out of the dust to the heights of spiritual life.

If you do these things, with just the simplest honesty of your heart, just as well as you can, without any pretence—I tell you in the name of all the faithful whose ranks you now join, and who have tried it and found it true—the narrow path of duty will lead to life for you, such life, so rich and full, and sweet, and prophetic, that not all the soul's most triumphant songs, sung or unsung, can overtake the theme. This is the joy that was set before One who endured the cross, despising the shame. It is to his work, his sorrow, his joy, I welcome you. His Helper is yours, the Helper who has brought you to this hour. He will never leave you nor forsake you. He will more than fulfil your best hopes—our best hopes for you. He will forgive you when you fall, and lift you up from the dust, and help you to help His children around you. "O magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt His name together." Amen.

CARMARTHEN COLLEGE.

The session of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, was brought to a close on Friday, June 30, when the prizes and certificates were distributed, and addresses given by the examiners. The result of the examinations was very satisfactory, the four senior students all obtaining honours certificates, the first and second year's men also giving evidence of good work done. There are four graduate students also in the College preparing for the B.D. examination of the University of Wales.

The deputation from the Presbyterian Board, which is the governing body of the College, consisted of Professor G. Dawes Hicks, the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, and Mr. Harold Baily, who were accompanied by Mr. Harold Clennell, the secretary of the Board. These gentlemen, together with Dr. Talfourd Ely, and the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, were the examiners. Professor Hicks presided at the prize giving, and delivered an eloquent address.

Dr. Dawes Hicks's Address.

Having referred to the work of the session, and the satisfactory results of the examinations, Dr. Hicks proceeded to speak as a student to fellow-students concerning their common work and the need of it in the world to-day.

A great Englishman of letters, he said, once declared the aim of culture to be a knowledge of the best which has been thought and said in the world. It was a great ideal, worthy of the distinguished scholar who proposed it, and in the sense in which he meant it undoubtedly large and comprehensive enough to satisfy the most exacting requirements. But applied as other men are wont to apply it, it often serves as a defence for something very much the reverse of that sweetness and light, which its genial author strove so energetically to recommend to his countrymen. It is perfectly true that there are certain towering minds in the history of humanity, acquaintance with whose thought, familiarity with whose ideas, forms the very ground and basis of any genuine system of education, Plato and Aristotle, Shakespeare and Goethe, Bacon and Darwin—the works of these men, and of such as these, can no more be ignored, or simply played with, by a real student than a carpenter can dispense with his lathe, or a medical practitioner with his thermometer. But the field of the best which has been thought and said in the world is enormously extensive, and he who rambles in it merely as an excursionist visiting places of interest, is but a dabbler and a dilletante in the realm of spiritual things and has no title whatever to the designation of a scholar. I believe there is no danger more seductive than this, and none against which we, who are so largely concerned with books and literature, require to be more watchfully on our guard. Nothing is more characteristic of the present age than the feverish speed at which we live, the insatiable craving to get along as quickly as possible, be it by railroad, or bicycle, or motor car. And the same kind of restless yearning is penetrating our intellectual pursuits, to the intellectual detriment both of those pursuits themselves and of the minds that might otherwise be uplifted by them. I suppose that that objectionable species of the genus "homo," the smatterer, the creature who is ready at a moment's notice to pronounce an opinion upon every conceivable topic of human interest, is an ancient parasite of our race,—certainly long ago Socrates lashed him with his dialectic and Horace held him up to scorn,—but I doubt whether he was ever so much in evidence as he is now, or whether he was ever able so to impose upon the credulity of an unsuspecting public. Now, this, it seems to me, is a degradation into which those of us who are trained and nurtured in a College such as this are peculiarly liable to fall. The wide range of studies that are here cultivated, and of which it is needful that the broad outlines at least should be familiar to the educated minister of religion, is itself a temptation to the heavily-worked student to rest content with a mere surface knowledge of all and to make himself really proficient in none. And yet, everywhere and on every side of us, the crying need is for more men who are not dabblers or smatterers, but for men who can speak with deep and accurate knowledge upon the great problems of nature and life and duty. To satisfy that need, there is, I take it, but one way possible. It is that each of us students, whilst striving to gain as far as we can a broad, general foundation of culture, should concentrate our strongest energies upon some special branch of intellectual discipline, so that in time we may become thoroughly at home with its methods of research, and intimately acquainted with the details of which it consists. To know something of everything, and everything of something is by no means a bad motto for a student, provided that he distinctly recognises that the last clause of the motto is infinitely more imperative upon him than the first. And here, in the curriculum of this College, out of the plentitude of subjects dealt with there is ample opportunity provided for the exercise of choice. Do not misunderstand me. I am not advocating any premature decision as to the direction which the bent of one's own mind is the more adapted to take. During these three years of pupilage by far the wisest course is to throw oneself with vigour and resolve into the work of all the classes and to do one's level best in each. To begin to specialise before one has obtained a bird's eye view of the whole territory, and that is about the most that can be here achieved, is the deadliest of all blunders.

But it is, I should say, a sure sign that a man has mistaken his vocation, if, at the end of his college career, he does not find himself drawn towards one object of study more imperatively than towards others, if he does not feel for it a kind of personal love, if he is not ready to sacrifice any amount of ease and comfort and worldly advantage in order to make it really his own. It is a sorry result of the quiet years spent in a place of learning if it does not awaken in us some breath of the genuine students' devotion and ardour, some sense of the worth and value and dignity and joy of intellectual effort, not as a means to some lower end, but for its own sake alone.

Dr. Hicks then spoke of the need of thoroughness of training for the ministry of religion, as for any other profession, and of the high ideal of his service. He quoted Carlyle's splendid praise of the honest worker with his hands, and of him who worked for the spiritually indispensable, not for daily bread, but the bread of life. And he concluded: Gentlemen, you and I, each in our respective spheres, have deliberately chosen this second mode of service; let us see to it that we carry out faithfully and well the charge which thus devolves upon us. If we are to offer to others the bread of life, we must first of all win that bread by honest manly toil of our own head and brains. Some little plot of the spiritual vineyard we must cultivate with zealous care, gather its fruits and make them our very own, before we can offer them to others. Some truth divine, we must so have loved and cherished and pondered over, so engrained into our thought and mind, that men may know when we speak of it we are speaking as those who have authority and not as the scribes. And that we can only do by remaining students all our days; by resolving that come what may, we will first and foremost reserve ourselves opportunities of becoming acquainted at first hand with the great themes of which we are to be the spokesmen to others. Everywhere men and women, troubled and perplexed with the momentous issues of life and death, are looking to us for thoughts and ideas and ideals that may be to them grounds of hope as they wend their way from the cradle to the grave. Let us not offer to those who are thus looking to us for spiritual food that which has cost us nothing. In the stress and strain of material enterprise, it is only with difficulty that the light streams in. Wisdom in the days of Solomon lifted up her voice in the streets and was not heard. It is even so now; the streets are not the place for wisdom. Wisdom is the fruit only of calm thought and earnest reflection; and the streets are full of bustle and turmoil and hurry. Do not give, then, all your time to them. Resolve, ere you leave these walls, that no small part of it shall be passed in the stillness that is the absolute requisite of the thinker, and in that patient seeking for truth of which you have learnt here the value and the need.

The other examiners also spoke, Mr. Harold Baily making sympathetic reference to the death of Mr. John Warren, of London, the late treasurer of the Presbyterian Board, who has been succeeded in that office by Mr. I. S. Lister.

Principal Evans having spoken, the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Dawes Hicks, and the Rev. Philemon Moore spoke on behalf of the professors. The Rev. John Thomas, of Merthyr (chairman of the Independent Committee) thanked Dr. Hicks for his inspiring address, and the Presbyterian Board for their care of the College. Several Carmarthen ministers joined in the expressions of thanks, and the proceedings closed with prayer.

THE SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The 103rd meeting was held on Wednesday and Thursday, June 28 and 29, at Llwynrhydowen, Cardiganshire. A very large number of ministers and other members of the society met, under the presidency of the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford. All ministers in charge of Welsh churches were present at some part of the services, and, in addition, the Revs. W. James, J.P., the secretary, Mr. J. Evans, treasurer; Rev. S. Jones, Pontypridd, Mr. L. N. Williams, Aberdare; Messrs. Jones and Morgan, Tonypandy, Capt. Davis, C.C., &c. as well as a large representation from all our churches in Cardiganshire.

The committee of the Sunday-school met at 5 p.m. on Wednesday, Rev. J. Davies, Alltyplacca, presiding in the absence of Rev. T. A. Thomas. Arrangements were made to carry out the work of the section for the coming year, officers being also appointed, with Mr. John Evans, solicitor, Llandyssul, as president. The income of the section, which depends mostly on annual collections made at the schools, was adequate, leaving a small balance to the good. When the business was over, the meeting resolved itself into a conference, and a fine paper on "Sunday School Ideals" was read by Rev. Simon Jones, and afterwards discussed by the chairman, Messrs. Ceredig Jones, W. James, D. Rees, R. J. Jones, and Hathren Davies. A hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Jones was passed.

In the course of the two days, there were, as is usual and indispensable in Wales, three preaching services, the first at 7 p.m. on Wednesday, the other two at 3 and 6.30 p.m. on Thursday, when sermons were delivered to large audiences by Revs. D. R. Davies, Pentre, D. J. Evans, Cwmbach, J. P. Kane, Dowlais; the appointed preacher, D. Rees, Bridgend; J. Hathren Davies, Cefncoed, and R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare. On Thursday morning at 9, the committee of the Association met, Mr. Ceredig Jones presiding. The Secretary read his report, adverting mainly to the two great events that have impressed themselves upon the public attention of Wales during the year, viz., the Revival, and the vigorous opposition to the coercion policy of the Government in Education, and warning Unitarians and those in sympathy with them to be on the alert, in face of the seeming unanimity of the great orthodox denominations, to demand religious instruction on their lines, when an amended Act under Liberal auspices will come into force.

The Treasurer then read his balance-sheet, which showed that the subscriptions and collections had not been so satisfactory as in former years. However, to avoid the scale of grants formerly made being lowered, the president, very generously, made up the deficiency by an extra subscription of a substantial amount. The "Ymofynyd" fund was reported to be in a sound condition; and it was generally felt that the magazine was doing a good missionary work, and made up one of the most valuable assets of the Association. Whether due or not to the excessive circulation of the magazine, the Welsh Postal Mission, inaugurated a few years ago, has not proved to be the success it was expected. The monoglot Welshman does not seem to be approachable on these lines. In spite of advertising in Welsh papers, north and south, the inquiries after Welsh Unitarian Literature were few and far between. The project has been in consequence abandoned, in order to concentrate all further efforts on the extension of the magazine. The following were appointed to the various offices for the coming year:—President, Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Hinckley, late of Gellionen, vice-president; Capt. Davies, secretary and treasurer as before.

At 11, after a devotional service, impressively conducted by Rev. J. Davies, Alltyplacca, the annual address was delivered by the president, who chose as his subject, "Cheerfulness in Religion." It was such an address as might be expected from the matured skill and experience, as well as the cheery optimism inspired by the great affirmation of the Unitarian faith which a ministery of twenty-five years has only served to deepen in the heart of the preacher. It was a remark often made that, notwithstanding his long residence in England, his Welsh remains untainted, and retains the freshness, pure and undefiled, which it possessed when he was a boy in the vale of Aeron 40 years ago. On the proposition of Rev. D. Rees, supported by Rev. Lewis Williams and J. Hathren Davies, a hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Jones for his address. At 2 o'clock the Temperance Section met in conference, the Rev. R. C. Jones, Lampeter, presiding, when a paper on the organisation of Bands of Hope, &c., was read by Rev. E. O. Jenkins, Llwynrhydowen. It was timely and practical, and the discussion carried on by the chairman, Messrs. Hathren Davies, J. Morgan, &c., emphasised the points that had been dwelt upon in the paper. Measures were taken by the appointment of officers, travelling lecturers, &c., to make this section an effective agency of the Association. A word of acknowledgment is due to the friends at Llwynrhydowen, who had made such a plentiful provision for the physical wants of their numerous visitors. The weather was very favourable, and the sociable meals partaken of in the booths on the chapel premises as well as al fresco constituted a very enjoyable part of the day.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Mansford-street.—The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from the Mansford-street Parsonage, Bethnal Green, E.:—"May I appeal to your readers for subscriptions to our convalescent and country holiday fund? I am arranging for a number of people, children, elder scholars and teachers, members of the mothers' meeting, and the congregation, to go away for a short holiday this summer, and I shall be very grateful for any help your readers can send me to cover the necessary expenses. I shall be glad also to receive any donations to our Window Gardening Society, which is now in need of funds. We are holding our annual flower show on Tuesday, July 25, when various prizes will be given for the best grown plants, &c."

Ainsworth.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, July 2, by the Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester. Large congregations were present at both services. Special hymns and anthems were rendered by the choir and children. The collections amounted to £34 16s., a slight decrease on last year, which is accounted for by the unfavourable state of the weather.

Barnard Castle.—The congregation lately invited Miss Mellone, of Warrenpoint, to become their minister, having had a pleasant experience of her ability for ministerial work, and the general acceptability of her services. Much to her own regret and that of the people also, Miss Mellone has been compelled by unavoidable private circumstances to decline the call. The congregation are hoping soon to obtain the services of a permanent minister. The church is a very pretty one, and there are enough adherents to form the nucleus of a fairly strong congregation.

Colne.—On Monday evening, July 3, a "congregational welcome" was given to the Rev. and Mrs. John Evans in celebration of their marriage. There was a good attendance. Addresses expressing the congregation's best wishes for the welfare of Mr. and Mrs. Evans were given by Mr. R. Duerden, and Mr. J. W. Hird. The Rev. E. Allen (Burnley), and Mr. J. Bullough (Halliwell-road, Bolton), also spoke. Mr. J. Wilkinson, on behalf of the congregation, presented to Mrs. Evans a handsome silver-mounted oak biscuit-barrel, and to Mr. Evans two oak-framed photogravures, viz., "Jesus disputing with the doctors," "Jesus and the Rich Ruler." Mr. Evans gratefully acknowledged the gifts and good wishes.

Ditchling.—This delightful little meeting-house under the South Downs celebrated its anniversary on Sunday last, when the Rev. E. Daplyn preached two excellent sermons to the many friends who gathered from Brighton, Lewes, Horsham, Billingshurst, &c., to support the faithful few who worship there each week. The Lewes choir (Westgate) very kindly gave vocal selections in the afternoon. Luncheon and tea were provided at the neighbouring hostelry. A very happy and profitable time was spent, and the day was delightfully fine. The collections in aid of the chapel funds amounted to £7 10s. 6d.

Downpatrick.—Sunday, June 25, was a red-letter day with the non-subscribing Presbyterians of Downpatrick. The venerable meeting-house, which dates from 1712, being in need of some renovation, it was resolved to invite Prof. J. E. Carpenter, of Oxford, to preach special sermons. The day accorded well with the hymn which was sung at the morning service, "Summer suns are glowing," and the members of the congregation, who are widely scattered, came from all the surrounding district, some a distance of five miles, and being joined by friends from Belfast and elsewhere, there was a large assembly. Professor Carpenter's discourses, morning and evening, were highly appreciated. On Monday Professor Carpenter lectured on "The Story of Gotama, the Buddha," in the Town Hall, which was quite filled by a large and representative audience, several clergymen of other denominations and many townspeople being present. The lecture was greatly appreciated. The collections, together with subscriptions from friends outside the denomination, exceeded expectations, and will enable the congregation to accomplish all that is at present desired.

Glasgow: Ross-street.—On Sunday forenoon, 25th ult., the Rev. E. A. Russell, on behalf of the Sunday-school and church, presented Mr. James McPherson, late Sunday-school secretary, with a pocket book containing a sum of money. Mr. McPherson, who is leaving Scotland for New Zealand for the benefit of his health, was wished a prosperous and healthy life in his new home, 12,000 miles over the sea.

Hinckley.—On Sunday last, July 2, the Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached at the Great Meeting by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, minister of the place. Special hymns and anthems were given by the school children and choir, with Mr. Lewis Wykes (of Leicester) at the organ. The old chapel was brightened by flowers. Very large congregations attended, and satisfactory collections were taken.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday last, at the morning service, a memorial font, presented by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, the hon. sec. of the church, was unveiled by the donor and designer in the presence of a large congregation. The Beatitudes were then pronounced by the minister and the responses sung by the boys of the choir, after which a special hymn was sung by the congregation. The font stands in the middle of a small baptistery chapel, panelled and seated with oak woodwork, and in the central panel is a tablet of beaten brass bearing the inscription "To the Glory of God and the Service of the Church this Font was dedicated by Ronald Potter Jones, in memory of his Mother, who died December, 1904." The font itself is also of richly carved oak, hexagonal in shape, and supported on the wings of six angels, which, respectively represent the contemplative and the active life. Six brass panels enrich the sides, one bearing the inscription "Suffer the little children to come," and the others containing five beatitudes. A very graceful cover is adorned with three cherubs, and is lifted by a small metal cross. The font rests on a pavement of green and white marble, which is slightly raised above the level of the aisle. The whole is a rich and reverent, if not unique, work, beautiful and tasteful in every part. The wood carving was done by Hatch, of Lancaster, and the metal work by Montague Fordham, of Bond-street. A special christening service will take place on Sunday afternoon, following upon the flower service for children.

London: Kentish Town (Jubilee).—July 5 being the actual anniversary of the opening of the Free Christian Church in 1855, a meeting was held on Wednesday evening in the school-room to celebrate the jubilee. The Rev. Henry Gow presided, and there were about fifty people present, including the Rev. G. Critchley, the present minister of the church, and the Rev C. E. Pike, a former minister. Refreshments had been served earlier in the evening. After an opening hymn and prayer by Mr. Critchley, Mr. Arthur Cooper, hon. sec., read the same historical statement as he presented at the recent jubilee bazaar, telling of the foundation of the church by the Rev. W. Forster, its open principle as a Free Christian Church, the distinguished people who had belonged to the congregation, and the succession of its ministers. The chairman said he brought from his congregation at Rosslyn-hill a message of good will and hope for the future prosperity and strength of that church. When a man was fifty they could not speak much of his future years, but with a church it was different. A church was only worn out if the spirit of its first enthusiasm and devotion died away. It was true their environment was changed, and had become somewhat depressing, but the message of a church was direct to the soul of man, and to the power of will which enabled them to live a noble life whatever their environment. They were apt to speak and think too much of the "large opportunity" for their churches. They must not wait for such an opportunity. Men of faith and devotion made it for themselves, as the leaders of the great Tractarian movement had done in the Church. If they were inspired by a living faith in God and the soul of man, they would be so possessed by living truths and effective power that they would enter into a better future and secure higher victories and higher results than ever. The Rev. F. K. Freeston then gave an address on the foundation principle of their Free Christian Church, and beside their original motto, "Diversity of opinion no bar to Christian Communion," set that of the old Shrewsbury chapel, founded by one of the noblest of the ejected of 1662, "This place was not built for a faction or a party, but to promote repentance and faith in communion with all those who love Jesus Christ in sincerity." For such an inclusive catholic church many others were now longing, and he trusted they would be ready for such a larger fellowship when it came. The Rev. C. E. Pike followed with a message of "Courage and Cheer" for his old congregation, and the Rev. F. Allen, an original member, and for many years a devoted worker in the church, who last Sunday preached the jubilee sermons, gave an address of reminiscence, quoting some fine sayings of Mr. Forster's on the open principle of the church. The Rev. G. Critchley moved, and Mr. Forbes seconded, a vote of thanks to the chairman and speakers, and the doxology and benediction concluded the meeting. The Rev. John Hunter, D.D., is to preach at the evening service tomorrow.

Midland Christian Union.—The summer meeting of the Council was held on Monday, June 26, at the Bath-road Church, Wolverhampton. The president of the Union, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, was in the chair, and among those present were the Revs. J. C. Street, J. W. Austin, T. Paxton, A. Thompson, A. H. Thomas, W. C. Hall, J. B. Higham, Messrs. H. Perry (Chairman of the Wolverhampton Congregation), T. Oliver Lee, and W. Cheshire. An interesting paper was read by the Rev. A. Thompson, of Dudley, on "The Institutional Church," followed by a discussion. In the evening there was a public meeting, which was well attended. The Rev. A. Hermann Thomas, of Stourbridge, spoke on "The Function of a Living Church"; the Rev. W. C. Hall on "The Bible in the Light of Modern Criticism," and the Rev. J. C. Street on "Unitarianism a Reconciler of Religions." During the intervals anthems were rendered by the choir.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meeting of the Association, held at Kendal on Saturday, July 1, was greatly enjoyed by a very large gathering, including representatives from Chorley, Preston, Lancaster, Blackpool, &c. The concert, which is always an attractive feature of these meetings, was given by the choir from Percy-street Unitarian Church, Preston, who had combined their annual picnic with this engagement. The choir went early to Windermere, and, returning to Kendal in time for tea, afterwards gave an excellent concert. The Rev. H. V. Mills expressed the warm thanks of the meeting.

Shepton Mallet (Appointment).—The congregation have unanimously invited the Rev. J. B. Robinson, of Lewins Mead Domestic Mission, Bristol, to be their minister. Mr. Robinson will begin his ministry early in the autumn.

Walmsley.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, June 25. The scholars' address, which was very suitable for children, was given by Mr. C. E. Reed, of Horwich. The Rev. E. E. Jenkins preached to large congregations in the afternoon and evening. The fine weather enabled many visitors and friends to come together from the neighbouring churches, so that the old chapel was much too small for such a gathering. There were almost as many outside as inside during the afternoon and evening services. Special music was rendered at each service by the choir, and the singing of the children was an attractive feature. The collections amount to £51, a little in advance of last year.

NOVELLO & CO., 1, Berners St., London, W.

This book has been prepared for churches of the Liberal Faith, and chiefly with a view to supplying a long-felt want—a book in which the appropriate tune is on the same page with the hymn. The words have been carefully selected to provide expression, not for one school of thought only among Liberal churches, but for the whole range of religious life and experience. The musical Edition contains most of the well-known and popular tunes by Dykes, Sullivan, Barnby, Stainer, &c., associated with familiar hymns, and new tunes by well-known musicians for newer hymns. The harmonies have been revised by Mr. Granville Bantock.

Special terms are offered to churches taking quantities. Application must be made in all such cases to the Secretary, 3, John Street, Hampstead, London, N.W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FOR the International Meetings at Geneva, Aug. 28-31, it appears that most of our English members intend to leave London on Friday, Aug. 25, and to take their holiday weeks in Switzerland afterwards. No parties of thirty can be made up for Aug. 11 and 18, and the hope of the special cheap return fares on those dates has to be given up. Members who have to take their holiday before the Geneva week, and had planned to leave on either of those dates, must make their own arrangements. If they are able to join one of Cook's parties they may still obtain return tickets at a considerable reduction.

THE question has been asked whether for the evening meetings at Geneva evening dress will be required. The reply of the chairman of the local committee is that evening dress is not obligatory, but it will be worn by the majority of resident gentlemen both at the conversazione on Wednesday evening, and at the banquet on Thursday.

IN noting last week the passing by the Chamber of Deputies of the Bill for the Separation of Church and State in France, we put down the majority as 233. But that was really the minority vote, there being 341 votes in favour of the Bill, which was therefore passed by a majority of 108. Those of our readers who are interested in this subject should note the article on "Separation in France" by Mr. Robert Dell, in the current number of the Independent Review.

A FIRST Baptist World Congress is being held in London this week, to be concluded on Tuesday next. The Congress, as it was stated in a telegram of greeting addressed on Wednesday to the King, represents a membership of over seven million communicants, of whom at least seven millions are English-speaking, while six and a half millions, white and coloured, belong to the United States. The venerable Dr. Maclaren is President, and delivered a brief inaugural address at Exeter Hall, in which he besought his hearers to remember two crystal phrases, which carried everything he wanted to say—"In the name of Christ," "By the power of the Spirit." If they were right in those two relations all would be right. When, however, the President asked the Assembly to show the world where they stood, by rising and repeating with him the Apostles' Creed, there naturally appeared, as the Christian World records, to be a good deal of abstention. The first paper of the Congress by the Rev. J. D. Freeman, of Toronto, on "The Place of Baptists in the Christian Church," claimed that it had been their glory to have been the chief champions of soul liberty. The Congress sermon was preached in the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Wednesday evening by Dr. A. H. Strong of the Rochester Theological Seminary, New York, and will appear in next week's Christian World Pulpit.

NOT less than 120 men and boys appear to have been killed by the terrible explosion in the Wattstown Colliery, Rhondda, on Tuesday. Fathers and sons have perished together, and there were many heartrending scenes as the dead were brought up and recognised by their relatives. Such a sudden disaster appeals to the keenest sympathies, both among the people themselves and throughout the country. The Lord Mayor of London has opened a Mansion House fund for the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of the miners killed, in which he says: "The calamity is one of the most distressing which has ever arisen, and I feel certain that the benevolent public will welcome an opportunity of expressing, promptly and liberally, their sympathy with those thus suddenly plunged into the deepest affliction and misery. Subscriptions may be sent to the Mansion House or to the Fund's account at the Bank of England."

THE full text of the address on the influence of the Labour movement on international peace which M. Jaurès was to have delivered in Berlin has appeared in his journal, l'Humanité, and in the German Social Democratic Vorwärts. It is to be hoped that we shall not have long to wait for an English version, which could hardly fail to serve the cause of a better agreement among the peoples. The French entente with this country is not, says M. Jaurès, directed against Germany; neither will the closer amity which he hopes to establish between the peoples of France and Germany be aimed against this or any other people. We cannot be too thankful to Count von Bülow for the assistance he has unintentionally given in showing up the decision and clearness with which the labour party adheres to the principles of peace.

THE visit of the famous Lancashire band, Besses o' the Barn, to France may be described as a small event, but it will have not unimportant effects in spreading a stronger sympathy and spirit of amity between the peoples of the two countries. The working classes of France have flocked in delighted crowds to hear the music of their British comrades, and the working men of Lancashire have brought home happy memory of courtesy and kindness lavished on them in France. In future when the band is heard at home there will sound also the echo of the life of the men and women of a sister country, and the consciousness will spread that the men who live in other lands are of like nature with ourselves. The incident points to the good future when the mutual friendship of the peoples will replace the old and the "new diplomacy," with its cruel and futile appeal to arms.

THE unseemly dispute for possession of places of worship between the two sections of the Free Church of Scotland proceeds, and much bad feeling exists. At Navin, on Sunday last, a somewhat dramatic scene occurred in the giving up of their church by the U.F. Section. The Provost, who is a leading member of the body, surrounded by a large number of his indignant fellow members, at the door of the church they had to leave read a fervid but dignified protest against the course of action taken, and then headed the march to the hall in which, as evicted persons, they are meanwhile to meet. The supplanters are not a tenth of those whose places they have taken. The districts in which such scenes are occurring are literally in a state of sectarian warfare, and there is no saying to what the strife may lead. Fines have been inflicted on the more riotous without effect.

WHILE the Ecclesiastical eye of Scotland is upon the House of Commons in expectation of the passing of the Church Bill, an important movement has been begun by laymen of the Established Church with a view to effect some real modification of the Confession of Faith. The clause in the Bill dealing with the Confession does not in anywise bear upon the substance of the creed, but only on the terms of subscription. This is deemed insufficient by the more radical minds. They think the time has come for modernising the Confession, and they have associated themselves with this purpose in mind. They have had private meetings in Edinburgh, and are arranging for meetings elsewhere. This movement is fraught with great theological and religious issues. The "Wee Frees," by their bigoted and reactionary doings, have roused the country thoroughly, and a revolution in creedalism will speedily be effected.

THE second part of Sir Edward Russell's article on "The Religious Life of Liverpool since 1850" appears in this month's Sunday Magazine, and contains portraits of the Revs. Charles Birrell, Hugh Stowell Brown, Charles Beard, and Charles Garrett. In the course of notes on various denominations occurs the following:—"The Unitarians in unbroken lay succession vindicate their essential Christianity from generation to generation by unflagging philanthropy, and they have had here signal and special advantage in three of the most spiritual preachers of their denomination—John Hamilton Thom, James Martineau, and Charles Beard. But, here as elsewhere, their actual adherents are few, though everyone admires them." Towards the close of the article Sir Edward Russell refers to the work done for social purity by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, together with Mr. Alexander Guthrie and Dr. Lundie, and to the influence of successive generations of the Rathbone family through many forms of Christian benevolence.

ONE striking figure has been removed from among the leaders of the religious life of Liverpool since Sir Edward Russell's article was written, in the person of Monsignor Nugent, who passed away on June 27, at the age of 83, honoured and beloved by men of all Churches and parties. The statue by F. W. Pomeroy, in this year's Academy, to be erected in St. John's Gardens in Liverpool, represents indeed the dignity of the Monsignor, but not at all the exquisite grace and brightness of the man the people knew and loved. A native of Liverpool, educated for the priesthood at St. Cuthbert's College, Durham, and at Rome, Father Nugent, after short terms of service elsewhere, came back in 1849 to Liverpool, and for the rest of his life was closely identified with work among its poor. He was appointed in 1863 the first Roman Catholic priest under the Prison Ministers Act of that year, and for more than twenty years was Chaplain of Walton Gaol. In 1872 he established the Catholic Total Abstinence League of the Cross, and throughout his career took a foremost place in temperance work. In his Saturday evening concerts people of all connections gladly helped, and for the homeless boys and the outcasts of a great city he did a great work of compassion and helpfulness. Through his efforts many neglected lads found new homes in Canada. A sermon of his on "The Story of Magdalen" was published in the first volume of the Liverpool Pulpit, edited by the present Dean of Ely and the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and C. F. Aked, and when Mr. Armstrong invited representatives of different churches to expound their principles from the pulpit of Hope-street Church, Father Nugent, though he could not preach from the heretic pulpit, sent a valuable letter. He also cordially joined in the Liverpool Conference of Ministers of Religion on Social Questions. A portrait of Mgr. Nugent, presented to him by the citizens of Liverpool, on his completion of 50 years of public service, is now in the Walker Art Gallery.

"THE Roots of the Love of Christ" was the title of a sermon preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in Hope-street Church, on Aug. 23, 1903, and now published in the current number of Sermons for the Day. Answering the question, how it was that we as Unitarians had such deep reverence and affection for the man Jesus, and how that was related to their actual religious life, Mr. Armstrong said:—"I think the root thing—the thing deepest "down—is certain real touches and suggestions in the Gospels themselves. Whatever their literary history, whatever their discrepancies, however thickly the mythology has overgrown the original historical facts, however impossible it may be to lay hold of those facts with precision and certainty, there are touches of infinite tenderness scattered through these ancient books, swift gleams of a light that never shone on land or sea; there are pictures, impressions, phrases, which seize upon the imagination of the heart, and have a deathless power of fascination for our affections. This is quite independent of any critical discussions. They are there, these touches, and nothing can take them away; and they are associated in our minds indissolubly with Jesus, the son of Mary. And whether this or that item of the narrative be actually historical or not—and that we can never know—I, for my part, believe that these touches, these gleams, could never have got there, if at the back of them had not lain a personality of captivating charm and most winning power. That person behind all the words, behind all the deeds, behind the outward history, behind the manifest myths and play of imagination, is no mere shadow, is not itself the unsubstantial fabric of a vision, but is valid, and through all the overlying strata of legend and misunderstanding and exaggeration and distortion, still draws us by its undying attraction and holds us by its inborn charm and power. So that I do think that it is a real historic Jesus who in the first place draws our hearts towards him in deep affection and allegiance, a real historic Jesus who indeed found the wild flowers and the birds messengers of God, loved the little children, cheered the stricken women, and had the brave word of hope and faith and inspiration for all those toiling on the way." But about that historic Jesus, he said, there came to be gathered all their ideal of what the perfect life with God must be, and it ought not to be a trouble to them that the historical Jesus was so idealised; they should let the ideal have full sway in their hearts. It might be Jesus or another who had stirred all that was best in a man and most clearly unveiled to him the face of God, but whoever it was, he was that man's Saviour. And the sermon concluded: "And deeper, I think, and larger "than all these human affections, beautiful and sacred as they are, must be, "in the full disciple of Jesus Christ, "that love of God which Jesus himself set first and foremost among all the "commandments by which we are to "live. That is the great deep sea of which these are the bays and creeks. "The more we learn to feel and know "the living God in all things and "in all men, the more we see him "in the world of nature and the world "of man, the more our life and thought "are saturated in him, the Ever-present, "the Eternal, the Fathomless and Perfect "Love, the more pure and true will all "these human affections be, and the "more shall we breathe that mind of "Christ which would seem to be the "brightest revelation of his glory which "God has ever bestowed upon the "world."

THE Council of Legal Education, it was announced in Thursday's Times, has appointed Mr. W. Blake Odgers, LL.D., K.C., director of legal studies. When the necessary alterations are completed, he will occupy chambers at 15, Old-square, Lincoln's-inn, in the same building as the offices of the Council.

THE Rev. F. A. Russell entered last Sunday on his ministry at the King's Weigh House Church. His sermon was on the Christian sense of obligation, and had to be preached, unfortunately, during a severe thunderstorm, which rendered close attention very difficult. The sermon appears in this week's Christian World Pulpit.

THE many friends of the Rev. E. W. Lummis will hear with great regret that the hope of his summer holiday has been disappointed, and that he is ordered by his doctor to winter at Davos. The congregation of the Great Meeting, Leicester, have been obliged with the deepest regret to accept Mr. Lummis's resignation. A brief report of the meeting will be found among our News from the Churches. Davos has done great things for the Rev. C. F. Aked. May it do likewise for our friend!

IT is noticeable that his commendation is given never to rapturous feeling, always to practical goodness or to insight into moral truth.—G. S. Merriam.

HE who in any case admits doctrines which contradict reason has broken down the great barrier between truth and falsehood, and lays open his mind to every delusion.—Channing.

LITERATURE.

A PHILOSOPHY OF ACTION.*

IN the INQUIRER of September 19 1903, we noticed Professor Séailles' remarkable "Affirmations of the Modern Consciousness," a volume of papers and addresses in many respects similar to the one now under notice. Fragmentary as they both are, the two books are evidently the work of a strikingly original and practical thinker; and of all the pages which are being printed to-day, few are at once so wise and so arresting, and, above all, so pregnant with life itself as those of M. Séailles.

At the same time they are not a little perplexing, for their frank and exhilarating call to action conceals a whole world of dark and difficult questions which remain unsolved. Their author is, doubtless, fully aware of this. As a professor of philosophy, who is also deeply engaged in the work of practical reform, he knows as well as any the baffling, bewildering nature of this complex of contrasts and contradictions which we call "life." He shows, in passing, that mere materialism cannot possibly explain the higher life; he is urgent in proclaiming the place that philosophy must hold in the programme of education. He is an idealist throughout; there is no page of his which is not instinct with the idealistic spirit. But, in these papers at least, he deliberately abstains from the metaphysics of philosophy, and from all theological and eschatological speculation; leaving on one side these "ultimate questions," he addresses himself to actual conduct and affairs.

He concentrates the whole force of his powerful personality upon the problem of an ethico-social education, and the fact that M. Séailles has much to say upon this question of practical as well as of philosophical importance, should give a wide circulation to his work.

In the present crisis of educational affairs, both in England and in France, it may seem hazardous to seek in the elementary school a centre of general agreement and unity, whereat the warring sects may meet as upon neutral ground. But this is exactly what M. Séailles proposes, in harmony, of course, with a large body of thought on both sides of the Channel. Seeing in education the most practical of all the processes of reform, he desires to remove it wholly from the regions of sectarian strife. Of old, he says, men were united by a religious tradition; to-day they are seeking a similar bond in their loyalty to a national ideal. This cannot be promulgated in the churches of the sects, or under their teaching; it can only be bred and spread abroad in wholly undenominational public schools. And such schools alone can become the centres of the new national life. "Modern society," said Edgar Quinet, in 1849, "lives upon the principle of the mutual love of its citizens, a love independent of their religious belief; and this mutual love can only be inculcated in wholly non-sectarian schools. M. Séailles is one of those who regard their country as an apostle among the nations. He is a statesman of the prophetic type, and his philosophy is at once religious and political, that is to say, it is a truly social philosophy. In his preface, dated from Barbizon, he re-states the idea which underlies all his teaching, that the old dogmas have become effete because modern thought has discovered larger affirmations of its own. These affirmations centre in the principle of respect for the Ideal Man, a man as yet unborn, who alone can be Free, Equal, and Fraternal. This is the Man whom the Republic has anticipated, and for whose sake she is prepared, if needs be, to perish. The life of a democracy, which by its very constitution promises the advent of such a Man, is one long process of strenuous ethical education to prepare his way. Its citizens, each and severally, are pledged to become in so far as they are able, men like unto him; and to refuse their countenance to any social condition which hinders anyone among them from realising that Divine Manhood. For the Divine Man supposes, also, a Divine society. Democracy requires the substitution of voluntary co-operation under the Higher Law—which alone brings social peace and personal liberty—for coercion and the mob. Such, then, is the spiritual programme of France.

So far we have seen M. Séailles as a thorough-going idealist, who sets about his task of reform by ascertaining its goal. But he combines with his vision the practical patience of the realist; he knows that the ideal can only become real through the life-long consecration and labour of intelligent men. This knowledge brings him into stern conflict with all the fatalism in human nature, whether it find expression in the Marxian, Evangelical, or Orthodox Catholic dogmas. The earthly paradise cannot be separated from us merely by the red river of revolution; we have ourselves to create our kingdom of heaven-upon-earth, for nowhere does it await us ready-made. Thus, for Professor Séailles, laborare est orare. And the labourers to whom he especially addresses himself, are, as I have indicated, the elementary teachers of France. In them he sees the apostles of the new religion, which will interfere with nothing of the old that remains; but will create again that unity of purpose which has long been shattered. It is the part of the teachers to call every man to humanity while still he is young; to give to all the first consciousness of individual worth, associated with the conviction of social duty; and to open their minds to the idea of that great, encompassing, enduring life in which they share (pp. 15, 16). While it is none of the teacher's duty to give his pupils ideas about God, he must prepare them to discover for themselves if there be a God by setting them upon the road in which they should meet with Him. He must make their spirits fine and strong, by developing the inner consciousness of those living and dynamic truths which bring with them their own authority and reward. He must teach them the laws of moral hygiene; leaving them to form for themselves their own individual conceptions about Deity and the Beyond.

But while M. Séailles writes thus of L'Ecole sans Dieu, he wisely warns his readers against mistaking the non-religious for the irreligious; and stigmatises official atheism as "the most odious form of fanaticism and intolerance." He warns them also against the worship of authority, personified in the State. The object of their devotion is Liberty, incarnate in an ever nobler society of nobler men and women.

He addresses teachers, but he remembers that education does not end with the courses of the elementary schools. M. Séailles, as I noted before, has been one of the initiators of the Popular Universities (Universités Populaires), and several of these essays were first spoken as addresses to the members of "The Co-operation of Ideas," the earliest U.P. to be established in Paris.* The future historian of this most interesting and important movement will find much that is suggestive in these lectures. To the ordinary reader, moreover, they are packed with virile thoughts, the ideas of a man who knows that one can only learn about life by living, who defines his philosophical notions by putting them into practice, and who is, therefore, one of the pioneers of a truly pragmatical philosophy.

One criticism remains in my mind after turning these pages: that in his philosophy of action M. Séailles seems at times to overlook, or even to deny the fact, that the greatest of all sources of human power is of mystical origin. He does well in seeking to focus the thought of his hearers and readers upon a life of practical usefulness, but to attempt to sever the Gospel of Action from its natural basis in the experience of the spirit is, I believe, to deny one of the "Affirmations of the Modern Consciousness."

IT is a really difficult task to write an uninteresting book about Stevenson, but Dr. Japp has successfully achieved it. Anyone who will let Stevenson speak for himself, and will tell us about his life and conversations cannot help writing an interesting book. There is no character in modern literature with so much charm as Stevenson's. Only give him the least chance, and he will save any book from dulness into which he enters. But there is a certain type of man against whom even the gods fight in vain. The chief point of Dr. Japp's book—we might say the only point—is the contrast exhibited between two types of egotism—the egotism which charms and the egotism which repels. Stevenson, in a sense, was an egotist. He was always talking about himself, always relating his adventures and impressions, whether among books, or on his travels, or in his own mind. Part of the charm is his childlike confidingness. He nestles up to you and prattles, as it were, and tells you all about himself in perfect trust in your good nature and your sympathy. And he speaks about himself, not because he wants you to admire him, or because he cares for nothing else than his own personality, but from good spirits and a friendly feeling. He gives himself to you because he likes you, not in order that you may like him. Human nature, my dear fellow, he seems to say, is intensely interesting; human life, in spite of all its drawbacks, is wonderfully exciting. Listen to me, and I will tell you about mine. His self-revelation is a vindication of the worth and beauty of life. It is absolutely free from conceit and vanity. He expects you to share his feeling about this wondrous and surprising gift of life. It is in himself as representing life, as witnessing to life, that he is interested, not in himself as an esurient, grasping, offended, competitive, separate personality. He identifies himself with you and you with him, he is not making capital out of you, nor urging any selfish claim, nor posturing for your admiration. Dr. Japp, on the other hand, is always obtruding himself, not as a representative, but as an individual clamouring for recognition. He likes Stevenson because in his genial, kindly way Stevenson showed interest in him, as Stevenson would have done in the case of a cannibal if he had met him. What Dr. Japp says about Stevenson's father is very characteristic—not of poor old Mr. Stevenson but of Dr. Japp—"I shall never forget how, in those early-morning walks at Braemar, finding me sympathetic, he unbent with the air of a man who had unexpectedly found something he had sought, and was fairly confidential." Dr. Japp has a curious family resemblance to another egotist—Mr. George Moore, about whom Mr. Chesterton recently wrote one of his striking little reviews. "We should really be much more interested in Mr. Moore if he were not quite so interested in himself. We feel as if we were being shown through a gallery of really fine pictures, into each of which, by some useless and discordant convention, the artist had introduced the same figure in the same attitude. The Grand Canal with a view of Mr. Moore. Effect of Mr. Moore through a Scotch mist. Mr. Moore by Firelight. Ruins of Mr. Moore by Moonlight."

Dr. Japp does not like Mr. Moore, and we quite sympathise with him in that feeling; but our sympathy with him on this point is weakened when we find him disliking so many other people too. He is offended with Lord Rosebery for not taking more notice of a letter in which he offered suggestions and assistance. "Had Lord Rosebery written and encouraged me to such an exercise, I should by and by have been very pleased to point out to him that he blundered, proving himself no master in Burns's literature."

He is offended with Mr. Gosse for making light of his importance in the matter of introducing "Treasure Island" to the world. He points out that Mr. Pinero is "wrong—totally and incomprehensibly wrong," in his dramatic criticisms, and he attacks Mr. Henley for his "spiteful perversions," perversions which it will be wise and kind to allow to slip into oblivion.

We are in a thoroughly un-Stevensonian atmosphere, an atmosphere of wrangling and small-mindedness and bitter feelings. The quotations from Stevenson's life and writings seem somehow out of place. They look like flowers stuck in the earth haphazard and wilting in an east wind. Perhaps it is time that there was an end of books about Stevenson. Certainly Dr. Japp's book does not encourage us to ask for more at present.

KNOW THYSELF.*

THE earlier volume published by the Rev. H. S. Solly nearly twenty years ago under the same title is known to many of our readers, and, though long out of print, it has not ceased to be useful. The author has now revised and added to the work, with the result that we have a much fuller and more satisfying book. The title-page quoted below indicates the scope of the argument. In so far as the spirit and basis go, the work is fitly described as an essay towards self-knowledge; but Mr. Solly has very properly proceeded to the wider knowledge either implicated directly in the mind's own life or specially valuable for its development.

Like Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," the book in great measure reproduces the main lines of Dr. Martineau's ethical and religious system. It begins with the fact of conscience, displays its authority, and its capacity for education, and identifies it with "the voice of God." The author evidently contemplates serious readers, and from the philosophy of ethics he leads directly to the subject of prayer, i.e., communion with Him whose "voice" is recognised in the moral law within. The beginner's doubts and difficulties are dealt with in a sympathising but firm spirit, and if no further were read there would be ample profit in reading the book thus far.

But there is much more. In addition to the self-knowledge that reveals the Giver of the moral law and the Aider of the dutiful, we have knowledge of outer things which in their structure and mutual relationship suggest a Contriver. Mr. Solly repeats the old "Design argument" with such modifications as the doctrine of evolution would seem to demand; and, again with his great teacher, Dr. Martineau, he emphasises the "Axiom of Causality." The belief in God thus established has next to be harmonised with the facts of sin and suffering, and if Mr. Solly, like every other apologist, has at last to leave something to the individual's own trust and patient working out, that is none the worse, we believe, for the individual's good. The argument that should leave nothing to a man's native wit would be truly uneducative.

After a full chapter on the subject of personal immortality, Mr. Solly gives two at the close of his book, respectively dealing with religion in the Old Testament, and the life of Jesus. The former is based on the modern critical view of the Jewish literature, and its perusal strengthens one's feeling of the entire reasonableness and profit of that view as contrasted with the old non-natural scheme. The "illustrations from the life of Jesus" are suggestive of sermon literature; but—shall we say—they will be welcome to devout students of life and religion. As already said, Mr. Solly demands a serious audience, and while he does not spare himself any pains in the endeavour to put things clearly and cogently, he demands attention in the reader, if any genuine benefit is to be derived. For classes of young men and women the work is admirably suited, provided always that the teacher or leader first masters the chapter and brings to its illustration facts and incidents of an attractive character. The reader who peruses the book in private must provide himself with such material. There is "substance" enough in it for a score of popular works such as issue from certain publishing houses, and presumably get read. We must congratulate the author on the re-appearance of his book in its new form, and ourselves on the evidence that scholarly thought still lives and bears fruit in our midst.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THIS month's Contemporary opens with the Presidential address of the Social and Political Education League on "Some Social Reforms," delivered by Sir Oliver Lodge at University College, London, on May 26, which takes up the parable of Professor Percy Gardner, last year's president. The address lays stress on the necessity for educating the average man if reforms are to be really effected, and sets forth a true ideal for our young people. "If "our devotion to material gain is too con-"centrated and strenuous we run the risk "of losing even that. Let the British "Empire uphold the right and the truth, "and it may hope and deserve to be "prosperous and perpetual; let it exhibit "itself to the world in purely selfish "guise, and decadence will assuredly set "in." To better the conditions of life in this country a reform of land tenure is one of the things Sir Oliver Lodge asked for, and a wiser and juster treatment both of paupers and criminals. As to the latter, he is certain that we are doing wrong. "We are seeking to punish, not "to educate, stimulate, reform. Punish-"ment is not our function. We think it "is, but it is not. It comes in incident-"ally, in accordance with the laws of "nature, but it should not be our primary "aim. We have a right to protect our-"selves, but we have no right to break a "man's spirit and undermine his intelli-"gence and character. Solitary confine-"ment does that." And so do hopeless idleness and degradation. A better future, Sir Oliver is convinced, is at hand, and with the extension of local government the best men will throw themselves into public service and real progress will be made. "Never were all classes so permeated by the spirit, not the phrases, but the essential spirit, of brotherhood and co-operation; never was there such universal recognition of the beauty of the spirit of real and vital Christianity, far above the differences and dogmas of the sects." With this address may be read the article by the Rev. G. S. Streatfeild on "Christianity and Social Service," in which he notes how the centre of theological thought and spiritual life has shifted from the Atonement to the Incarnation, and finds its issue in the practical service of humanity according to the ideal of Christ's life. His view is that the Church must demonstrate to the world that this ideal is rooted "in the fact and faith of the Incarnation," which alone can secure true progress to the world. To that doctrine we should give a different interpretation, but with a like confidence in the fulfilment through that ideal of the Divine purpose for mankind. Those who are interested in Mr. W. H. Mallock's cogitations will read his long article on "Through Matter to Mind," in which he begins to build a bridge back from a scientific materialism to a spiritual conception of the Universe. For summer refreshment there is "A Farming Holiday," by Constance R. Maynard.

The Nineteenth Century and After is largely occupied with the "Collapse of Russia," and forecasts of the future; while Dr. Jessop writes on "A Country Parson of the Eighteenth Century," Dr. Kerrick, rector of Dersingham, in Norfolk, who died in 1768. The Earl of Dunraven's article on "Ireland's Financial Burden" should be noted, and also that on "Organised Labour and the Unemployed Problem," by Mr. Isaac H. Mitchell, secretary of the General Federation of Trade Unions. Mr. Mitchell points out how potent an influence Trade Unions have been in their influence on the unemployed problem, and makes a strong plea for greater elasticity in the hours of labour rather than in the number of men employed to meet inevitable fluctuations of trade. There is a growing opinion, he says, amongst trade unionists that the solution of the unemployed problem, so far as it can be solved, rests with administration rather than with legislation. And his conclusion is: "To meet these fluctuations, nothing seems more sane than "that, on the first sign of depression, "works of public utility should be proceeded with. The Government and all "public bodies have always an enormous "amount of work waiting to be done. "Harbour works, Government buildings, "and repairs of all kinds should be proceeded with when times are bad, and "as good times return there should be a "slackening off of such work. One of the "most prolific causes of unemployment is "the practice followed by all contractors, "public and private, of refraining from "putting work in hand during the winter "months. In every business, indoor or "outdoor, there is a slackening off in "winter. Bad light and weather both "add largely to cost of production. But "what can workmen do? They do not "receive sufficient during summer to tide "them over winter, and it would surely "be cheaper and better for public authorities to spend money for extra labour "cost in winter than spend large sums on "extra Poor Law costs, or even on farm "colony work. Notwithstanding regulation, notwithstanding an intelligent "anticipation of bad times and the "pushing forward of public works, it is "conceivable that still there would be "those wanting work who could not obtain "it. To supply this need the Government "Bill might be useful, but without the "better regulation of present employment, "which would aim at making the hours "of labour, and not the number employed, "the elastic part of our productive system, "the Government Unemployed Workmen "Bill will be disappointing in its results, "as its machinery is likely to prove "dangerous in its operation."

"Ireland," says Mrs. J. R. Green, in her article in the Independent Review on the case of Sir Antony Macdonnell, "has been the martyr of English mediocrity." She has never been allowed to taste of the benefits of English statesmanship, far less of Imperial wisdom. And writing on "A New Way with the Lords" Mr. J. A. Hobson suggests the Referendum as offering the only hope of democracy as against the now hopelessly consolidated forces of obstruction to progress in the Upper House. Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's article on "Optimism and Mr. Meredith" should be well pondered. Meredith, says his interpreter, has written "a new edition of Sartor, with joy superadded. With him the flower blooms on the rock. But, even in his ethics, the rock is always there, under the flower."

"We are so accustomed to-day to look "for creeds, for short cuts to content-"ment by some other route than our own "conduct and courage, that we will not "believe that a man can teach us to live "healthy lives, unless he has some patent "medicine in his pocket. But, in fact, "there is no Morrison's pill to enable us "to digest the universe. We must trust, "not to drugs, but to exercise, clean "living, and cheerfulness." And in conclusion Mr. Trevelyan says: "The essence "of a religion is not a creed, but an atti-"tude of life; and Mr. Meredith's attitude "to life is a right one. A wary but "cheerful and benevolent Odysseus, "he steers us 'compact of what we "are, between the ascetic rocks and "the sensual whirlpools' (Diana, ch. "37), and he can listen unbound "to every song of the Sirens, enraptured, "but resolute by the rudder; and the "one-eyed Polyphemus of Despair is left "cheated and shouting after the white "track of his departing vessel." At the same time, we should add to rectitude and courage, for the best wisdom of life, trust in the Divine purpose and the ultimate victory of good, which is no drug for an enfeebled will, but an inspiring confidence, fruit of the truest insight of a faithful spirit. Mr. Robert Dell's article on "Separation in France" is a most interesting statement of the position from the point of view of a broad-minded Catholic, who distrusts the Vatican, and dislikes the religious orders, but believes that separation may offer a great opportunity to the Church and the people, if only they would dare to take it.

The World's Work and Play, which has for frontispiece an admirable portrait of the Right Hon. J. W. Lowther, the new Speaker of the House of Commons, and goes on to tell of the joys of the open air, in an article on "Caravaning for Pleasure," makes this month a new departure, and begins a serial story by Mr. C. Lewis Hind, "The Education of an Artist," a practical romance of a man who developed late, recounting the art education of Claude Williamson Shaw—how at the age of thirty-three certain glimmerings of a suspicion that life is a larger tapestry than the pattern woven by the author of "Self-Help," bursts into flame—how that flame was fanned by an artist acquaintance—how searching for a way to express his temperament he decided upon painting. Illustrated by Photographs of the Works that stirred, pleased, or annoyed him. The story is well begun, and the illustrations are capital. This number has also a second article on "Life in the Country Cottage—the Problem of Housekeeping on Limited Means," and among much other interesting matter, an article on "The Girl and the House," in the section on Woman's Work, telling of what is done at Sesame House, the English daughter of the Pestalozzi-Froebel House in Berlin.

The third number of the University Review discusses the "Training of Architects," "The American Professor and his Salary," "The Pronunciation of Greek," and other subjects. The frontispiece shows the John Harvard Memorial Window, presented by Mr. Choate, the American Ambassador, before his return home, to the Cathedral Church of St. Saviour, Southwark; and there is also a fine portrait of the late Canon A. S. Farrar, Professor of Divinity in the University of Durham. Among the University news, which occupies nearly fifty pages of the Review, is a note as to two gifts recently received by Harvard University, one of $100,000 to develop "a department of the ethics of the social question," the other of $55,000, the income to be used for a yearly Harvard excavating expedition to Palestine.

A GOLDEN WEDDING.

JULY 12, 1855—1905.

GOLDEN the sunshine on the summer flowers,
Golden the memory of long wedded hours:
Golden the thought of that sweet summer morn,
Golden the thought of troubles bravely borne.
Golden the love of children and of friends,
Golden the hours of happiness God sends:
Golden the fifty years, where Love has trod,
Golden the future, in the hands of God!

FLORENCE LAWFORD.

SOUTHEND HOLIDAY HOME.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—The Home at Southend, kindly given by Mrs. Bayle Bernard, is now receiving weekly contingents of elder scholars, teachers and others connected with our churches for whom it is intended. During last year 109 guests were received, and so far as we can judge from the applications coming in, there will be no vacancy until September next. The Home is open and available all the year round.

Beyond the payments made for board, about £100 per annum is required for maintenance. The subscriptions have somewhat fallen short, and if this very useful piece of work is to be continued, the subscribers' list must be increased.

Donations may be sent to me, or to the local hon. secretary, Mr. J. Murrow, at the Home.

FROM "HEART-BEATS" AND THE "SILENT PASTOR."

By PROTAB CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR.

A PRISONER, behold a prisoner of the Lord! Shut up by a will not my own, chained to purposes half hidden from my sight, labouring in every field I am sent to, labouring often without any apparent reward, with much apparent discouragement, scorned by men, I feel it sometimes very dark and desolate. There seems no way to escape out of these iron walls of circumstance. Providence is my prison-house. I am his bond-slave. But my prison, though it opens not outside, opens inside: The walls have hidden doors, which, at a touch from some unseen hand, are drawn up. Through them I behold scenes of enchanting beauty. My chains fall off. The unchangeable will becomes the force of a marvellous love. The hidden purposes become glorious altar-stairs to the bosom of Infinite Rest. Circumstance becomes my throne, crosses become my crown, the prisoner is turned into the King's son, the heir of immortal glory!

Poverty.

Next to my skin this rough blanket of poverty sits very cordially. It warms my heart to God and to mankind, the great majority of whom are poor. I doubt much if outside the ranks of the poor in Oriental lands there can be true charitableness, generosity, or sweet, forgiving love. The least touch of art destroys the bloom and fragrance of the soul.

The Way of Peace.

Behold, in trying to defend myself against those who must needs attack me, I have lost all dignity and peace. Peace returns to me only with thy forgiveness and love. O Friend of the poor, give me the strong mind without which thy service is impossible. Give me the pure, unselfish heart to regard thee above every other treasure.

Healthy Asceticism.

Believe me, there is more healthy asceticism in bearing the dealings of God cheerfully, and in loving man despite all he has done, than in all the fastings, scourgings, and rags. Cease to indulge thy spite, hatred, and ill-will. Love and do good against all odds; nothing demands greater self-mortification than this.

Keep Quiet.

It is about as mean to prate about one's poverty as about one's wealth. Some are always grieving over their ill-health, others boasting of their muscle and nerve. All is vain. Men get to know somehow what you actually are. I have now and then frankly told my friends how poor I am. But in vain. The shadow of prosperity and ease clings to me, I cannot shake it off. A prince outwardly, a pauper within. Sometimes also a pauper outside, a prince within. What strange delusion! Keep quiet over thyself. The wise and the loving will find you out.

Know Thyself.

Every man is the born master of spiritual riches hid deep in himself. But few, very few, are put in possession of their patrimony here. If thou didst only learn to gain and use what is rightfully thine, thou shalt live and die a prince among mankind. Know thyself, be thyself: it is the best thou canst be here on earth.

Blessed are the Meek.

The heaviest cross is light, if borne in meekness and trust; the lightest cross crushes one if the heart is heavy and sore with pride. Sufferings must come, it is the course of nature; but they do not necessarily cause misery. Pride is the cause of more than half our misery. Blessed are the meek!

Worship of Nature.

Lord, the voice of thy devotee grows fainter every day, and his words fewer. My soul would abide in thee unceasingly, but my tongue fails me. This infinite worship of the universe around me suffices: lead me out to it every day. Let the winds be my voice, the streams my spirit's outflow, the birds sing hymns for me, the clouds carry my thoughts to thee; let all nature be my priestess, and do for me what I cannot do for myself.

What is Spirituality?

Sentimentalism is not spirituality; neither is it morality, nor even insight, though all these go to make the spirit. Absolute subjection, unselfishness, and oneness of will with God, such as Christ exemplified, make up the nature of the spiritual man.

On Spiritual Culture.

My son, peace will not come to thy soul unless thou hast been blessed with a sense of the simple reality of divine things. Is the presence of God a fact of perception whereto all thy senses and all thy powers testify? Or is it only an opinion, a belief, an impression, a remote rare experience when the mind is depressed by circumstance? Yield thy whole nature to the sense of the Divine Presence when it visits you; and, believe me, there is no man, sinner, mourner, infidel, or fool whom the Spirit of God, the veritable unspeakable Presence, doth not at times visit and touch.

To live in Other Men.

My son, a man's own individual life is not his deepest or truest life; the life of the community whereto he belongs is his deepest life. Call it brotherhood, call it congregation, or church, or nation—however you may call it, this collective corporate life makes the higher existence of the man of God.

Lowliness.

Lowliness is not meanness or weakness, nor is nobility pride; but the noblest are always most lowly. True humility is an impenetrable stronghold, which neither insult nor injustice can take. The peace of the graciousness of God enables man to bear everything, while the proud are crushed by the tyranny of their own mortification.

Love of Men.

The love of humanity is a growing passion in me. I contemplate the wants and perfections, the joys and sorrows, of men with a strange personal interest. I love all men and women and children, the old and young. I love all. I have worked for the good of my kind. I delight to think I will die devoted to this work. God in man is a concrete reality. I will lose myself in that reality; and all hatred will cease in me, as well as anger and pride. Oh, blessedness unspeakable!

MUSINGS.

By A MINISTER.

XXIII.

PHILOLOGUS writes to ask what syncretism is, and, further, what eclecticism is, and what the difference is between them. I will do my best to satisfy him, but he has given me two hard nuts to crack, and I am afraid that, when they are cracked, the kernels will be as like as—two kernels.

The eclectic in philosophy is one who picks and chooses fragments of philosophic systems, and pieces them together into what he fondly hopes will be a harmonised system of his own. He is like the painter who combines selected features into one fair face, or the florist who ties his gathered flowers into a posy, and thinks no more of the separate plants from which they came. Religious eclecticism follows much the same course. The theories of the early heretics were largely eclectic. Between Christianity and Paganism there were those who found a modus vivendi in borrowing from both. The hope of happy compromise led to strange results. We read of one emperor in whose oratory stood the images, not only of Roman gods, but also of Isis and Serapis, Orpheus, Abraham, Apollonius of Tyana—and of Christ. Something of the same attempt to blend pagan views and Christian principles followed upon the Renaissance and Humanist movements in Italy at the end of the fifteenth century. In a new Pantheon, the image of Plato would now have been added. But the fatal flaw in eclecticism is this, that combination is not connection—certainly not vital connection. The life-blood of one system, philosophic or religious, cannot flow into another by mechanical adjustment, any more than two nations can interchange their energies through political alliance. Nor is it unity. There was true wisdom in the old imagining of wisdom as leaping whole from one brain. In its origin, a living idea is one and undivided, and thinks itself out; it cannot begin, or stop short, at a predetermined point. Nor, lastly, is it growth. Just as the loveliness of a face is something more than the blending of features, and the fragrance of a garden something more than the mingling of scents, so is truth something more than the composition of conceptions.

Syncretism does not go as far even as composition; goes no further than accommodation; unites systems more or less antagonistic, but does not attempt to reconcile them. A fusion of ideas being seen to be impossible, it is thought to be enough if they do not come into collision. Solomon was a syncretist when he set up the rituals of Sidon, Moab, and Ammon side by side with the worship of Jehovah. That statesman is a syncretist to whom all religions are equally useful; so also is the languid trifler, to whom they are equally interesting. There was a time in the fourth century when the mutual tolerance of Christianity and heathenism seemed to threaten a new religion; there was a time in the seventeenth century when Lutherans and Catholics were invited to compose their differences by recognising only their respective merits. Syncretism, it will be seen, both morally and intellectually, is inferior to eclecticism. It lacks earnestness and foresight. It bows itself in the house of Rimmon; it is for Christ and Diana.

Philologus is a supporter of undenominational religious teaching, and evidently wants to know whether in this he is an eclectic or a syncretist. I do not think that he is either one or the other. Undenominationalism would seem to be reached, not so much by addition, as by subtraction. It is the elimination of that which is inconveniently distinctive. I am not anxious to propose a better plan, nor perhaps am I prepared to do so, but I can understand how it is that, when Philologus thinks he is only straining out the gnat, Polynices, his neighbour and opponent, thinks that he is really straining out the wine.

Which way, then, lies progressiveness? asks Philalethes. To this I reply that we escape from standstill dogmatism, not by patching together systems of belief, nor by balancing them, nor by paring them away, but by cultivating a spirit at once philosophical and religious—philosophical, because it searches for unity in all past developments of thought, and religious, because it can still remain loyal to one tradition of faith. A faith too compliant, too ready to take in religions still at variance, may think to gain the whole world, and only lose its own soul.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

PEACE-MAKING.

"Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called sons of God." Matthew v. 9.

"Little children . . . love one another." John xiii. 34.

NEAR where I live there is a huge bank of earth that stretches along the country for miles. It was raised more than eleven hundred years ago by a warlike, ambitious king called Offa. Not only did he get power over all the kingdoms into which England was then divided, but he took a slice of land from a Welsh prince, and put up this "Dyke" to mark the boundary between England and Wales. Long after Offa's death, and the Norman Conquest of England, when our country had settled down under the rule of one king, and English and Normans were living peaceably together, obeying the same laws and growing more and more alike in customs and speech, the Welsh and English remained enemies. There was always some fighting, or robbing or destroying of property on either side of Offa's Dyke. Many years after Edward I. conquered Wales, and gave it a first English Prince of Wales, strong castles were kept fortified on the border. Had you lived there in those days you would have known the horror and misery of two nations at war.

And now! From my window I can see one of those grim old castles, but it is to-day the ivy-clad home of a quiet country gentleman, and we walk in the beautiful surrounding park as undisturbed as the deer that graze trustfully among the bracken. Offa's Dyke is covered with oak-trees, and hyacinths, and burrowed by many rabbits. A barbed-wire on its top keeps cattle from straying, but there are stiles for people to go to and from the farms on either side, while Welshmen drive by a road across it to sell goods at the nearest English market-town. I shall post this Children's Column to London at a tiny shop on the Dyke near the scene of a bloody battle between Henry II. and a Welsh prince. I go to work every day from England into Wales, and meet Welsh children trudging to an English village-school. They speak their own language to each other, and mine to me. In the spring they smilingly give me primroses to send to poor people in an English city. At school they learn many things from good English and Welsh teachers, and spend happy, useful hours drilling, singing, cooking and gardening. The boys play soldiers (Welsh and English nicely mixed in each army), but scarcely one of them will ever seriously think of going for a regular soldier when he is a man. The farmers, and colliers do show fight, when they want good laws made, or bad ones altered, especially an unjust law about their schools, but it is by holding meetings, and voting at the election of an Englishman to speak for them in the British Parliament, and we women and the children help the good-humoured battle with rival colours and bill-sticking on the cottage walls. All this means that the English and Welsh are at Peace, and there has been a great deal of peace-making to bring it about that everywhere the people of these two nations, in spite of present differences, and past enmities, live together in friendly fashion as loyal subjects of the same kingdom and empire.

Now you will find when you study more and more history, and grow up to serve your village, or town, or country as good citizens, that many things go to the making and keeping of peace, one person with another, one nation or empire with another. The best men and women are doing much to avoid or stop wars. Civilised people nowadays feel differently from those of even last century about the glory, or proper occasion or need at all of fighting. Yet we are still a long way from the time when all on this globe shall wholly do God's will by living lovingly together in God's great human family.

Living lovingly together. Why is not that what is done everywhere in the happiest and most peaceful homes? What helps all the peace-making all the world over is so simple that we can practise it every day from our earliest childhood. Christ put it into five short words, "Little children, love one another."

I knew two sisters who quarrelled so much in their bedroom that their mother fastened a tape across the room between the two beds, and made each girl sleep, and dress and undress on either side of it, and forbade them to speak to each other. This funny, uncomfortable and unsisterly arrangement soon cured them of squabbling.

There were once two old Scotch women so poor that they shared a lodging, but so quarrelsome that they drew a chalk-line across the floor, and each lived in her own half of the room, using door and fireplace when one was out of the other's way.

Now it is want of love that puts barriers between people. They are not all barriers that you can see like tapes, and chalk-lines, and Offa's Dykes. They are hate, jealousy, envy, selfishness, greediness. Not keeping our tempers, and pride are obstacles. So are unforgivingness, and want of imagination to picture two sides to a question. And there is unprayerfulness for those who vex or injure us. All these shut off our hearts and minds from those of other people, and hinder us from feeling and acting peaceably.

"Little children, love one another." Yes, the more love grows in the hearts of children, helping them to keep out of quarrels, to clear up misunderstandings, to overcome wrong, passion and ill-will by right-doing, reasonableness and loving-kindness, the more love will spread beyond home and school, till all shall know the blessedness of peace-making as Jesus did, and with him, be worthy to be called "sons of God."

We are but little children weak,
Not born to any high estate;
What can we do for Jesus' sake
Who is so high and good and great?

When deep within our swelling hearts
The thoughts of pride and anger rise,
When bitter words are on our tongues,
And tears of passion in our eyes,

Then we may stay the angry blow,
Then we may check the hasty word,
Give gentle answers back again,
And fight a battle for our Lord.

With smiles of peace and looks of love
Light in our dwellings we may make,
Bid kind good humour brighten there,
And still do all for Jesus' sake.

There's not a child so small and weak,
But has his little cross to take;
His little work of love and praise,
That he may do for Jesus' sake.

Wren, wren, chirrup again,
Tragedy music resigning;
Sing, wren, into my den,
Music of midsummer-shining!

A UNITARIAN VAN.

How shall we take our message of religious life to the people? By what fresh methods can we speak our word more effectually to those who, we believe, ought to hear, and would be glad to hear, what we have found to be true of the higher life with GOD? Lectures in public halls have done, and are doing, admirable work for the enlightenment of thought on matters of religion; literature, through the ordinary channels, or through the quiet ministry of the Postal Mission, often accompanied by helpful and sympathetic letters from faithful workers, reaches many who cannot hear the spoken word; occasionally, where there is a large measure of energy and faith, popular religious services have been held, in theatres or public halls, with no thought of church extension, but simply to speak the word of life, and to gather the people in for an hour of worship and brotherly fellowship. These are some of the methods, and the work of the Domestic Missions is another, by which members of our churches have gone out to the people to carry to them the quickening and helpful message of religious life. These are in addition to the natural influence which every living church must exert by its very existence, when power goes out from the assembly of its worshippers and effective sympathy gathers in the friendless and solitary to share the glad fellowship of a religious home.

And now another method is proposed, in the letter which we publish this week from the Rev. T. P. SPEDDING, of Rochdale, and his paper on "A Van Mission," read at the meeting of the Missionary Conference last week, and also published here. The method of the travelling van is not new, but has long been used for many purposes of popular appeal. It is only new in connection with the work of our churches.

There are passages in Mr. SPEDDING's paper which brought to us, we confess, some misgivings. He proposes that there shall be a Unitarian Van, which shall travel for Unitarianism. Who ever heard of a Methodist Van travelling for Methodism? Surely it travels simply for the sake of the Gospel, to save men's souls. But very quickly Mr. SPEDDING disarms our misgiving, for describing the work the missionary of the van is to do, he says that in the religious services to be held the addresses should be affirmative, not controversial, and religious rather than doctrinal; there is to be a brotherhood "that speaks for GOD and man in the strength of JESUS." That is an admirable ideal, and if that is what is really intended and will be carried out, we say: GOD speed the Unitarian Van! If only our Lancashire brethren have a man fit to send out on such a mission, by all means let them equip the Van and put it on the road. He must not be one who is eager to blow a noisy Unitarian trumpet, but a man overflowing with human sympathies and a passion for righteousness, a man of simplicity and strength, who can speak straight to the people's hearts; and he must go out to declare to them pure, unsectarian religion.

If, then, on some quiet summer evening he has spoken to the gathered people on a village green, or on the hillside near some manufacturing village, and has so spoken as to make them feel the Divine presence in the midst of their common life, the gladness of trust, or the worth of courage and honest dealing and purity and brotherly kindness, or the hope of a better life and the meaning of self-sacrifice and mutual service, and the joy of the great fellowship on earth and in heaven, the brotherhood of the followers of CHRIST, and then someone curious in such matters says: "What, is that Unitarianism?"—he certainly can answer, Yes, that is it. At least, that is the only Unitarianism worth caring about. It does not want to have anything to do with sectarianism.

That, we are convinced, is our true message to the people. Everywhere they are hungering for religion—even where they do not know it—for strong confidence and the joy of life with GOD. If only we will be truly religious here in GOD's world, and speak simply for religion, which is concerned with the real things of life, as MR. SPEDDING says, "for GOD and man, in the strength of JESUS," the hungry will be fed, and there will be gladness wherever the word is heard, and our Unitarianism may quite well be left to take care of itself.

Indeed that is how Unitarianism will most surely make its way in the world, whether in the tracks of a travelling van or in our churches. Neither it, nor any denominational interest must be our chief concern, but simply the needs of the people, with whom we feel that we must share the strength and joy of that true life with GOD. That is our doctrine of salvation. As we have faith to preach it we shall find salvation both for ourselves and for our churches.

Our columns are open for a full and frank discussion of this matter of the Van. We should be glad, for one thing, if Mr. SPEDDING would tell us a little more of that "beautiful pessimism of the Anti-Unitarians within the fold," of which he speaks. We have no acquaintance with it or them.

A VAN MISSION.*

BY THE REV. T. P. SPEDDING.

IT would be a good thing if every man and woman in England could have an easy opportunity of hearing something of our Unitarianism. There are many different opinions among us as to methods—whether we should proselytise or abstain from proselytising, and do or not do many more things too numerous to mention—but I think we should all be glad if by some fair means the good words of our faith could reach the hearts of all our countrymen. There is no likelihood of that yet; but it is possible to do more than we do. No one can complain that our little corner of the vineyard is too big; nor need every desire for its extension be sternly repressed. The surprising fact is, that with a faith such as we hold, we should do so little in its behalf. If you do but compare it value for value with that of other communions, it comes home to one with a pang that they would secure a better hearing for it than we do; and that at their hands it would cease to be the obscure sort of thing that it remains with us. Look at Lancashire and Cheshire, where our representation is supposed to be most complete. We have many congregations in the two counties; but there are over 100 towns and villages, with populations of 1,000 and upwards, and comprehending altogether considerably over a milllon souls, where we are entirely unrepresented—a state of affairs which no other denomination with half the wealth at its command would tolerate.

It is not necessary that we should settle paid ministers in all these places. We need not therefore estimate what it would cost to put up 100 chapels. It takes us all our time to maintain a handful of mission churches, that run, as a rule, into the second and third generation, before they attain their independency. The millennium will have become a matter of ancient history before Lancashire and Cheshire are evangelised at the present rate of progress. But there are other methods open to us. It is already admitted—by our popular services in theatres and by successive courses of lectures addressed chiefly to the cultured—that it is expedient to carry some portion of our good tidings to those who are not likely to join our churches. Advertisements which appear in the secular press divulge a desire to introduce our literature to those who are not Unitarians. It is sometimes alleged that our Book Room sales are as heavy among the orthodox as among ourselves. We have lately issued some of the works which we deem popular in sixpenny editions. These things are all to the good; but do they not mean that we believe in sowing the good seed wherever a seed plot offers itself? Are they not proofs of the human weakness, which we share with most others, of desiring that our good things shall be known? At irregular intevals I receive propagandist pamphlets from an unorganised agency called "The Open Brotherhood," advocating universal charity towards all men and breathing out threatenings against Unitarians. The chief characteristic of this particular literature is its oftentimes violent sectarian and propagandist zeal. I do not complain of that. It is evidently the production of men who are in earnest about an idea; filled with proselytising zeal, and by necessity sectarians, though in their heart of hearts they believe their sectarianism to be world-wide. I commend to you also the work of the Postal Mission, a society which is engaged in perhaps the most useful propagandism that we can boast of at the moment. I judge from these signs that the building of churches is not our sole object. We are content to spread the truth whether a church comes out of it or not. And upon these facts I rely for the statement, that a method of propagandism is not necessarily open to objection if it does not lead directly to the establishing of churches. Not that I have any personal dread of their multiplication. It would be a cause of rejoicing if any new method that we adopted tended either directly or indirectly to widen the borders of our household faith. There are many places in this district and others where we ought to have churches, and if a Van Mission could do anything to make up the deficiency its work would be all to the good.

But if as a result of our discussion such a Mission be established, my point is that it must not be deemed a failure if it does not lead to this particular result. Other bodies are engaged in work of this kind, religious and political. Their cars go where they are represented, as well as where those churches and societies are without representation. They follow highway and byway, and they call a halt wherever men will listen to the message that they bear. And I ask in vain for a reason why we should deny ourselves an equal opportunity. It even appears to me as possible that our own cause might be helped by the Van Mission in districts where our churches are not over strong, and that the co-operation of the local minister and his people might do both them and the Mission a world of good.

But to this end, and every other, it would be essential that the Van Mission should be true to its colours. It would be folly to start such a work under any vain pretence. The limitations of liberty would have to be recognised. You cannot crowd all the symbols into one flag—and too many flags are confusing! Your cosmopolitan wants a badge without distinctions; without any of your narrow bands. But your cosmopolitan is a citizen of nowhere. He essays to embrace the world, but his feet are never on the ground. Everything has its disadvantages; but a few definite convictions are worth all the hazy notions. I love the world, but I love my own home better. As a Unitarian I love Catholicism and Buddhism, and all the rest in a general sort of way; but I love my Unitarianism in a special sort of way. I was born into that; and I hope I am fixed there. I tell my young men to specialise in social work, in philanthropies, in politics, even though they are tolerant of all. You cannot help in everything. The world is too big for one man or one society to serve all its causes. Universal redemption does not come through one man. So if you are going to have a Van Mission let a few things be clear, and be content if you can make them plain. There are other vans on the road for other things. If yours is a Unitarian van, supported by Unitarian funds, be bold enough to admit that it is what it is. It would never do to disown or disavow, or modify, or deprecate the object it was designed to serve, its origin and purpose. If you are sowing seed let men know what sort of crop to expect.

If you start a van, then decide first what it is going to be. The necessary explanations may follow. Let it travel for Unitarianism; and if haply it shall be only the first of many, let it be also known as "The Richard Wright Memorial Car," so that for ourselves it may call to mind the greatest travelling missionary we ever had. It may pass through districts where he laboured, and strew seed in the good ground which for longer than a generation you have allowed to lie idle.

Everything depends upon the feasibility of a scheme of this kind. It was lightly supposed by a writer in the Christian Life, a week ago, that half-a-dozen young men of earnest disposition might establish a Van Mission in the suburbs of any of our great cities before the end of the present month. But it is a bigger thing than that. The question is not new. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have more than once discussed a van scheme, and decided that they could not go on because of the difficulties. And if our strongest Association comes to such a conclusion, we are wise not to rush into an enterprise of this kind. But I do not think the difficulties are the same in this case; and we start with an assurance from the secretary, of the Association's sympathy and assistance. The Postal Mission has also discussed and declined the proposal, but some of its members are interested, and I think we may rely upon its support. The country also is covered more or less effectively by Missionary Associations. So that wherever the van travelled it would come within the sphere of influence of one or other of these societies; and I am bold enough to believe that they would regard the car as a useful auxiliary, and that in various ways it would receive their support. Indications of the kind, indeed, are to hand.

In our own consideration the question of the van is not the greatest difficulty, because that is practically provided. An anonymous donor has promised £100, and that is almost enough to provide a van of which we might be proud.

There are other important details, however, demanding attention, e.g., haulage, maintenance, and manning. To provide a horse and harness would cost perhaps another £50, with 10s. per week for stabling, and possibly the wages of a driver. But I do not think a horse need be purchased. The Land Nationalisation Society have tried both owning and hiring, and find that after the first outlay the cost is about equal, say, £14 for three months. The advantage of a horse comes in if a holiday tour is the object, but our first consideration is work, not pleasure. The United Methodist Free Church find it unnecessary to buy a horse, and they get drawn about frequently for nothing. The Church Army, with its hundred vans, of course, owns cattle. In our own case 15s. a week would be ample to provide for all our needs. The cost of maintenance would depend on the man. If his wife accompanied him, there might be economy. Where vans are used for holiday purposes 30s. a week covers the expenses of a couple.

How is the van to be manned? By a paid missionary, or by volunteers? The Land Nationalisation Society chiefly sends its agents, so that no special item for salary appears. The U.M.F.C. sends out its probationers. I think our plan would be to hold only week evening meetings at the outset; to find men who would "travel" from Monday to Saturday for two weeks each, returning at the week end for their Sunday duty. If Sunday services were advisable, laymen might be willing to assist, and our students might take part. Travelling expenses would be additional. I estimate the expense for three months at £41, and reckoning five meetings per week, there would be a total of sixty meetings at a cost of 13s. 8d. each. Other expenses should be provided for in the initial expenditure.

The meetings would begin with singing, the hymns being hung in front of the platform; there would follow a reading, a prayer, an address, an opportunity for questions or remarks; another hymn, and the benediction. A neighbouring minister should be asked to preside, and some of his young men to distribute literature. The address should be affirmative, not controversial; religious rather than doctrinal. If there be controversy it should come from the outside. The missioner might have cards and express his willingness to correspond with inquirers, or to put them into communication, say, with the Postal Mission. Literature should be distributed, some special leaflets being provided for the Mission. From the sale of books there might be a trifling gain Freewill offerings might be taken, though a formal collection should be avoided. If it is known that the services are voluntary, the offerings are more likely. The U.M.F.C. cleared £10 in a season with one van. The route should be carefully mapped out beforehand; suitable pitches found; bye-laws ascertained; a hawker's license, if necessary, obtained; bills posted; and conferences held with neighbouring ministers.

It is not for me to enlarge upon difficulties. The information supplied by those who have tried the experiment is encouraging; the difficulties are raised by those who apparently have had no practical experience. Perhaps it is fortunate that this proposal should be made in this city. It is a good thing to dwell in the new-found Manchester atmosphere of faith. We do bigger things than this. We have proved in another matter that if our minds are made up there are plenty who will support us. It is not the whole denomination that is qualifying for extinction. It is not every man who believes that we have had our day. There are some who will still rally if there is no uncertain sound in the call; some who believe that there is work for us to do despite the beautiful pessimism of the anti-Unitarians within the fold. They will rally to this open brotherhood that speaks for God and man in the strength of Jesus. If those who might be our leaders will not go in front we will still march on. And there is one word more. Our churches are half-empty; so are those of other folk. You cannot gather men into your temples and tabernacles, perhaps; but they will listen to you in the market squares and the open places. You might at least try — whether is it that you have no gospel, or that men have decided that they will have none of it. And I think that out of their experience our men would find, when they came back to their pulpits, that there was no less humanity in their sermons through this contact with the world, and that though their voices might be harsh and strident, there would be a new note that would compensate.

In his sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit, on "The Many Ways to the Celestial City," the Rev. Charles Hargrove presents and interprets a picturesque parable of how all earnest seekers, by whatever way on this earth, and of whatever Church, all reach at last the divinely appointed end of life; for when that which is perfect is come, "in the full vision of truth all differences of creed and practice which now divide us 'shall vanish away.'"

We may satisfy ourselves of this truth —that a contracted sphere of operation implies a languid centre, an unenterprising soul—that a Church that has not faith enough to set its heart, and stake its fortunes, on great deeds of love, will never provide a religion for human nature —will never be acknowledged by any large number of men as their nursing mother, their highest encourager on earth of the endeavours which God's Spirit prompts—and that when it has served its temporary purpose, it must pass away, and yield its place to some nobler representative of Christ. Any Church must perish, and deserves to perish, that does not occupy the hearts of its disciples with great projects. It dies because it does not ennoble men's lives, nor employ their energies, nor feed the highest of all appetites, the hunger and thirst of the soul for service and sacrifice. — John Hamilton Thom.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

Close of the Session.

The annual public examination of the students was held on Tuesday, July 4, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester. The attendance of visitors, especially of alumni of the College, was large.

The Visitor's address was delivered by Professor Philemon Moore, of Carmarthen, who congratulated the College on the high standard of attainment which had been shown by the students. It was a standard, he said, which compared very favourably and very much to their credit with that which had been noted in the past. Alluding to the institution of a Faculty of Theology at the Manchester University, he expressed the hope that room would still be left in the work for the post-graduate degree for somethirg more than "the acquisition of ready-furnished material" or the getting together of knowledge and information, and that the students would still be allowed in one corner of their field at least in some modest way to practise the art of burrowing out new information. The need of the University work prescribed for the graduate theological stud nts had, he said, brought some unavoidable changes in the preparation and the time that was allotted to certain subjects, and especially to the subject of literature. He urged them, however, not to let their humanistic interests fall into tht background under the pressure of other things. Literature appealed to all that was deepest and richest and best in human nature, and while theology, however necessary, tended to become narrow, great literature was preventive of any evil influences which might accrue from a too exclusive attention to professional theological interests. It would restore the just balance of their nature and faculties and interests, and would prevent them from becoming uninteresting to their fellow-men. Speaking of the approaching completion of the new collegiate premises in Victoria Park, Professor Moore said it was much to be hoped that "Summerville" might become a centre of interest to young Unitarian laymen, either as residents in the College or as helpers in the work that was carried on for the welfare of some sections of the population of the city or for the good of the cause.

Dr. J. Edwin Odgers, of Oxford, who is retiring from his position as a visitor of the College, joined in the praise which Mr. Moore had bestowed upon the work of the students, and said he hoped for the best results in the future from the connection of the students with the new Faculty of Theology of the Manchester University.

The Rev. A. Gordon, Principal of the College, read a list of academic successes. He said he had been gratified to find, in connection with the University examinations, that the pledge of absolute freedom from dogmatic tests made in connection with the institution of the Faculty of Theology had been a real promise, amply fulfilled. Among the successes in the University examination announced by the Principal were a first-class in all theological subjects by Mr. Herbert M'Lachlan, M.A., and a second-class in each of his subjects by Mr. Edgar Thackray, B.A. Students of the College had also taken high honours in the intermediate and matriculation classes. Mr. Gordon further announced that the principal College prizes—the Sharpe prize for Biblical subjects and the Bibby Greek prize—had both been awarded to Mr. M'Lachlan.

The Principal then presented the usual certificate to Mr. Herbert M'Lachlan on the completion of his course. Mr. M'Lachlan is to continue his studies as "Hibbert Scholar."

The Valedictory Service was held in the evening at Cross-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A. The singing was led by the choir of Longsight Free Christian Church. Mr. Wicksteed, in his address to the students, laid emphasis on the value of the "scholarly mind," and the importance of realisirg the personal responsibility for statements made by the individual. Many pitfalls which are in the minister's way might thereby be avoided, and the greater strength of character gained could not but have a healthy influence upon those to whom he ministered.
